Between Friends has heart and that is Don Shebib's rare gift. There are enough holes in the movie that it should never have touched me, but it did, enough so that I didn't join the spontaneous applause at the end because I was still a little raw. Paperback Hero, on the other hand does a number of things right, but even the best get gummed in slickness. When the centre is hollow there is not much that can come of the veneer.

The performances have a lot to do with it. Everybody in Paperback Hero is too pretty. While it was nice of director Pearson and producer Bassett to allow Keir Dullea, who has always played sensitive young men, to read for the part of a small-town tough, it was disaster to give it to him. He tries but it is like Dustin Hoffman as a gun fighter. Similarly, model Dayle Hadden just doesn't look at home in Delisle Saskatchewan. Hers is not farm stock.

Elizabeth Ashley is beautiful to look at, and I rejoice in her inclusion for that reason, but the problem is the same. There is no dirt under any of their nails.

For all its being shot on location, Paperback Hero has a lot of Hollywood and Toronto in it, and not much Saskatchewan, not enough faces, not enough farm work, not enough sense of space. Its shots of sky and field are lovely enough, but always a bit out of rhythm. Everything seems brought in from outside, like Lightfoot's city man's version of country music adopted for the theme. Why weren't Humphrey and the Dumptrucks, loyal Saskatchewan musicians, used. Or, even Don Messer — though a Maritimer, he would surely be a lot closer to Delisle, Sask. sensibilities than Lightfoot. I am not calling for a documentary, but for characters and setting that make the same point with thoroughness and conviction. I am sure there are Delisle girls who tumble in the hay with the local hockey heroes, but I am sure they don't make sexual asses of themselves the way this film pretends. There is a new form of bumpkin being shaken by the city film-makers here.

One doesn't want to be this hard on a first feature by a local director, particularly one whose talent still shines a bit through the cheap shots and superficial seriousness of this sort of movie. But Peter Pearson has to learn to stop barking up the wrong tree or the talent will get lost, which is far from unprecedented.

But Shebib's movie has heart. Somehow, this director, writer, and cast have fielded a group of characters who ring true.

At some level, we are watching a gang of rookie bank robbers prepare for a hold-up. They are not after a fortune, they just want to get out of Sudbury, a common enough ambition. But more we watch Bonnie Bedelia with her just off-pretty features transfer allegiance from her still adolescent ex-surfer "old man" (Chuck Shamata) to his visiting surfer days buddy, (Michael Parks) a quieter and therefore more promising lover. We watch Bedelia's father (Henry Beckman), pick up a new scheme, auguring success on no other basis than "you can't lose 'em all". Meanwhile he has a prior concern with keeping a loving eye on his girl. Etc.

There are so many little accuracies in Between Friends that the odd clout for something totally wrong is easily forgotten. The mistakes are pretty central: the robbery plan makes little sense, and ex-surfers seem a bit of an easy target. Instead, one recalls Shamata's jealous, hurt digs after his woman has thrown him over. If we haven't said exactly what he says (some of us have) we've felt it. When you see such common events portrayed so simply and honestly here, you wonder why it doesn't happen in more films.

While actress Bedelia, actor Beckman and Hugh Webster, writer Claude Harz, director Shebib and composer Michale McCauley can all rightfully be singled out, there is something afoot in the whole company that is what really makes Between Friends. When Bedelia can no longer restrain her desire for Parks, she says to him, "I'd just like a man who could see through me. God knows, I'm not very complex." It's a dangerous moment: there is something provocative in the line that makes it jump out, and maybe something a bit wrong. It's on a borderline, and right out front. But somehow Bedelia's delivery, Parks low-key but immediate response, cameraman Leitelman's framing of it (etc.) combine to pull it off. It happens often enough in Between Friends that I liked it better than any film of the last six months.

Dr. Bach Variates His Tunes.

Bach: Goldberg Variations
Igor Kipnis, Harpsichord
Angel

What do you do for insomnia? Cry a lot? Drink a lot? Read until your eyeballs are falling out of your head from strain? Lie and twitch?

Yes, dear friends, insomnia is an age-old complaint. And Doctor Bach has just the right cure. A handy set of thirty variations on a catchy tune, guaranteed to set you to sleep on even your most distressed nights, just as they did for Count Kayserling.

Fanciful rot, you say? Well, I say so too. Yet this is just one of the romantic fables which cling to many great works. In larger detail, the story was that the Count was sick and had trouble sleeping. His adopted son Goldberg, a child prodigy, would lull him to sleep with a set of variations on a theme composed by Meister Bach, hence the name "Goldberg Variations". The truth of this story need not really concern us, and is best left for the musicologists.

When Bach wrote these variations, he published them, as he had published several sets of harpsichord pieces before. This was a revolutionary action in the music world where music was written mainly for the composer's own use and mass circulation was not favoured. Although he undertook this to get money (his job as Cappelmeister of Leipzig paid him an abominably small wage) it literally transformed the world of the composer in Western music.

The history lesson finished, we can look at the music. I can't see how anybody could get much sleep during these variations, as they're the most intriguing music ever written for the harpsichord. Certainly the greatest set of variations written before the time of Beethoven. The theme, which may or may not have been Bach's own, is run through an elaborate series of transformations. It appears as a concerto for solo harpsichord, as a canon, as a fugue, as a glittering technical exercise, and in many more forms.

The thing to remember is that before this set of variations had been written, the form of a series of variations on a theme was only a trifle in the musical world. Often designed to show off the performer's dextrous skill, the pieces written never really amounted to much more than a series of footnotes in composers' biographies. Bach and the Goldberg set brought such a complete change to this form that the effect was not even understood for a generation. Rather than confine the individual variations to a set of repetitive presentations of the theme (slightly altered each successive time), Bach handles the simple aria with great skill, often building up a complete variation on only a small part of the tune.

By the time the thirtieth variation is reached, the theme is stretched and nearly unrecognizable. In fact, Bach has a private joke on us, because the last run through the set is a "quodlibet", made up from two popular folk songs absolutely unrelated to the theme. The theme is played immediately afterwards, and the sense of tension is resolved as the familiar bars reach our ears.

Igor Kipnis gives these variations a loving treatment, taking his time to bring out the essence of each single unit. This results in an extraordinarily long playing time for the record, spread out over nearly four sides, using the the composer's Italian Variations as a refreshing filler. Most performers usually take the Goldbergs at an absolutely frantic pace, often leaving room on two sides. Glenn Gould made his recorded debut with these pieces on Columbia, and he "played like the wind", in the words of one critic. More recently, Anthony Newman produced the most thrilling harpsichord disc in years with a bravura performance of the same music. That record caused a storm of controversy in the recording world, because the Columbia engineers miked the instrument so closely that the strings seemed ten feet tall, and the sound was absolutely wrong, from the standpoint of what the instrument sounds like in the

Traditionalists hated the disc, and still can't tolerate Newman's stuff. I loved it. It isn't fair to compare it with Kipnis' new recording, though, Newman is giving his all for sheer speed on the record — in fact, harpsichord players that have heard the disc have been astounded by his velocity. He takes the showy variations at a pace that would bust the knuckles of a lesser player. If forced to the wall, though, I'd have to admit that it was a shallow performance, long on exertion, short on introspection. Kipnis isn't interested in being a superstar, just a good musician. This performance really does justice to each variation, by getting well underneath the surface of the music, examining every facet of Bach's inspiration. The slow variations emerge as pieces of great beauty, a sore point on the Newman recording. As for the sound, the EMI engineers aimed for, and got, a fine natural sound, unhampered by the heavy background noise that plagued Kipnis' last two recordings on Angel.

There may yet be a case for having both. Get Kipnis' for the sheer beauty of the music, and get Newman's for the greatest speed-trip ever heard on vinyl. I think I see the die-hard traditionalists approaching across the horizon armed with sharpened conductor's batons, but I'll keep on tikiing both approaches 'till they get me.

Kinky art: cripples and black sneakers

The most provocative new movement in contemporary art, usually referred to as 'conceptual art', sees itself as the first statement of the world-after-art. Art died just a few years ago, you see, although most conceptual artists are sentimentally drawn "back to the days of art" for their material with a neurotic necessity.

Conceptual art was born a true conspiracy. Its first impulse was to eliminate the public; it was art without an audience, participants. In a world of images each artist would specialize; an underground network was gradually evolved through which the postal system would transmit images. The images were not created, unless in collage, but were selected i.e. cut from magazines, postcards etc. The selected images represented 'idea'. There would no longer be art objects, but intangible and eternal ideas.

Here are a few examples of how it works: Fizzly Peat, 10 Martello St., Hackney, London E. 8, requests images of crippled ballerinas; Vince Alelli, 507 E. 12th St. New York 10009 desires representations of black sneakers; Phyllis V. Weldon 115 Northview, Montreal 263, asks for water. Other members of the network will supply these needs. The gallery and the audience is by-passed.

The above names and addresses were taken from the listings in the most recent issue of a new Canadian 'magazine', FILE. Such "correspondence art", however, is quickly evolving into a more public arena. The conspiracy escalates.

From File's Manifesto: "The only way to understand the concept is to forget about it. All re/course is to Art. All life is Art." and "We struggle together but our politics if they need be labelled such are but the politics of Vision...We thrive on our energies to create and sustain Myth."

File adapts its cover style from the LIFE of the 1940's, however this could not suggest that its function is parody. "For those to whom living is a fine art" is the General Idea. File attempts the rebirth of dada, a French based movement of the 20's and 30's which, seeing itself as anti-art, attempted to liberate consciousness by fragmenting the images of culture (culture perceived as insidious mind oppression); one could be freed from imposed meaning and achieve a purer life consciousness. The modern conceptual artist must be seen as one who is attempting to construct the menas of his own liberation.

If the 'avant-gard' is to be replaced by the Eternal Network (as suggested by Robert Filliou in France), what a danger lies ahead! For if this movement liberates itself from culture, creating its very own 'network', must it then eventually liberate itself from the Eternal Network itself? Where would it all end? Or would it? Is there not the possibility that when anti-art reigns liberation must return to its original repressor, art? Alas, I must leave you with these troubling questions and hope that they do not disturb your sleep.

The latest issue of FILE is available on some magazines stands in the vicinity, however, for this special Paris issue it has been deceptively re-labelled IFEL.

The new radical literature

One

It has become fashionable to inquire after the fate of the radical student.

It has also become fashionable to give answers. The most common answer is that radicalism was a fad, like the hula hoop or the conkskin cap. Now, (so the analysis goes), kids have different tastes — adding the 1950's. Lipstick and the Monster Mash are in again.

Perhaps. Only an incorrigible nostalgist could fail to see the difference between this year's U of T and 1969's U of T.

But at the same time, it's hard to believe that all that late-60's energy simply dissipated, or that we're re-entering the era of the panty-raid and the flask.

When history repeats itself, it's usually not so blatant.

It's true that 1970 was a turning-point for what used to be called student activism. It was a year that smashed a lot of illusions; students were beginning to realize just what they were up against.

When they pushed the university hard, the government stepped in — and governments have a lot of power. (The Kent State killings that year symbolized the shift, for they showed in very graphic terms that even white middle-class socially aware college students can be shot.)

At U of T, the level of conflict was somewhat more muted. But two significant events happened around the beginning of the '70s that pointed to the limitations of gung-ho student power. One was the imposition of the War Measures Act in October 1970, which showed would-be revolutionaries that the Canadian state too can flex its muscles. The second was something called parity.

Parity is something too boring to even discuss. But in 1970, it did have a certain symbolic significance.

Parity means quite simply that students and faculty should run the university together as equals, and was the culmination of four years of student pressure for a new type of university. The old university was an apologist for the status quo; the new university, so the theory went, would act as a centre to revolutionize society.

Parity flopped because students didn't back it. They didn't back it because it was only a shell — it had no content. You can only get excited about controlling the new university, if you have some idea of what the new university is going to do. But aside from suggestions for more courses in marxist theory, no one quite knew what the new university would do differently.

So as the '60s ended, many activists deactivated themselves and burrowed into Pamphlet literature tends to centre around the social sciences. Most uses some kind of left perspective. At its worst, it's chintzy propaganda; at its best, it opens up bold new insights into its subject. Much falls within the formal bounds of traditional scholarship. Pamphlets like Russell Hann's Some Historical Perspectives on Canadian Agrarian Political Movements, are academic tracts written for academics. Hann takes a peek at a little known corner of Canadian History (19th century rural Ontario) and suggests that industrialism did not come as easily to this country as grade nine textbooks would have had us believe.

We're used to hearing about prairie farm opposition to the industrial east, but have been able to treat it as a peculiar form of regional aberration. Hann suggests that this was just one part of a general overall farmer resistance to the spread of late 19th century industrial capitalism throughout Canada.

But while western farmers could organize politically around a unified transportation system (the railway), eastern farmers lacked a single focus. Their movement flopped. Hann's pamphlet isn't the definitive word, but it does sketch out another fascinating chapter of great failures in Canadian history.

Greg Kealey's Working Class Toronto at the Turn of the Century is another academic pamphlet that deals with the process of Canadian industrialization. It's the libraries to challenge the university from a different angle — on its content. Traditional scholarship had been accused of examining issues only from the view point of the dominant class. Radical scholarship would return to the facts, and look at them in a different way.

If the university couldn't be toppled, its ideology could at least be subverted.

Much radical scholarship would have remained a curiosity confined to academic journals and the dusty nether regions of PhD theses, but for a relatively new printing technology. That's the photo-offset press, a cheap and simple process that allows almost anyone, with a minimum of capital, to print pamphlets and small newspapers. The result is that almost anyone has — there's been a major surge of pamphlet printing throughout Canada by publishers like Toronto's New Hogtown Press or the Women's Educational Press.

descriptive piece, low on focus and analysis.

If you believe that the pain of the industrial revolution was confined to Britain, and Kealey; he uses unimpeachable sources (like the 1889 Royal Commission on the Relations of Capital and Labour) to document some of the more gruesome working conditions that existed in this city Toronto industrialized. It's useful as a summary of government probes into working conditions, but that's about all. Anyone at all interested in the development of the Canadian post-war economy could read Leo Johnson's Incomes, Disparity and Impoverishment in Canada since World War II. Johnson, a Waterloo economist, is one of the few Canadians to apply statistical methods to a radical critique of the Canadian economy. In this paper, Johnson figures that in spite of a rise in general affluence, low income earners have experienced a steady drop in purchasing power (they can't buy as much with their money).

It makes for turgid but thankfully short-ly's 24 pages — reading.

Universities have been criticized (and only so) for enveloping knowledge in a mystique. Academics produce information, but usually in a way as to be discernable only to other academics. Knowledge is for those in the know.

To combat this mystique, a brand of pamphlet publishing has grown up that uses the techniques of scholarship, but is itself at the mass reader. It's given us booklets like Le petit manuel d'histoire du Québec and the People's History of Cape Breton. Women at Work in Nova Scotia is the newest in the style.

Combining solid research, personal accounts and a definite point of view, the pamphlet does a pretty thorough job of both describing and analysing the position of Nova Scotia's working women.

Since it's written specifically for (naturally) women at work in Nova Scotia, most of it is of little more than academic interest for those who are neither female nor maritimers.

A much easier pamphlet to relate to is Women's Work, a collection of short personal accounts describing individual work experiences. Women's Work lacks the hard research of the Nova Scotia booklet, but as a collection of personal stories, it's not easier to read.

The articles are rough in style and content—a pretty common characteristic among pamphlets. And they fall prey to the occupational hazard of contestative literature — one dimensional characterization. For instance:

"During the week," writes the author of an expose of the post office, "I had several conversations with other women, about repression as women. When there was no one to talk to, I would read a paperback of essays on women's liberation."

New Hogtown Press is a good example of the not-quite-underground print shop. New Hogtown dates back to late 1969 when it was just plain old Hogtown Press. That concern had been started after the somewhat-radical Canadian Union of Students folded, in order to keep CUS research papers circulating. Hogtown sold its stock to U of T's Students' Administrative Council, in 1972 (for a song) under the condition that the publishing house change its name. It did — by adding the word, new — and now, from the SAC building publishes new material as well as distributing items from other not-quite-underground printers.

It sounds too dedicated to be true, but if you can forgive the occasional lapse into self-righteousness, it makes good reading.

For real gutsy reading, with minimal content, but lots of style, pick up any of the International Workers of the World tracts.

A widespread and active revolutionary union at the end of the first world war (they were the prime movers behind the 1919 Winnipeg general strike), the IWW (Wobblies) were pretty well smashed by the 1920's.

Or at least put into a state of suspended animation.

The Wobblies are still churning out pamphlets on issues like the wage-price freeze, all of them written the way workers were supposed to have talked 60 years ago. Lots of "Well boys," and "OK m'boys" or lines like "It's up to you and me to fight this, buddy." The tracts are usually interspersed with original 1913 cartoons, featuring top-hatted capitalists holding huge bags of money.

For the collector of political nostalgia, Wobbly pamphlets are a real find—especially their authorized song book, Songs of the Workers to Fan the Flames of Discontent. Most songs in the book—including items like Casey Jones the Union Scab, and (to the tune of a methodist hymn) Dump the bosses off your Back—were written by Joe Hill, the singing union organizer shot by the U.S. government in 1915.

already, now you do. No need to buy the booklet.

The YWCA piece provides a nice capsule history of South African race legislation. But it's weak on its very area of focus—the role of Canadian investment in the country. A better article on the activities of Canadian investors in South Africa appeared in a two-part series in the Toronto Star in either late July or early August. Catch it on microfilm in the library.

The successes are Don Roebuck's Post-Marxist Projections (a draft phantasy) and Adriano Sofri's Organizing for Workers Power. Both should be read by anyone interested (either abstractly or practically) in marxist political theory. Sofri, a member of Lotta Continua, a sort of revolutionary syndicalist Italian group, makes one of the few extended critiques of leninism available in left literature today.

Roebuck, who by now must be one of U of T's longest playing students warns the left (from the left) to "unpack their ideological baggage" and face some new possibilities. It's fresh, snappy, and although written in 1969, still relevant — a good buy if you feel threatened by creeping dogmatism.

One thing. Don't look to pamphlets for polished arguments or flawless logic. For most, that virtue lacks. But they do keep you in touch with some of the newest ideas and works that regular publishers either won't or can't afford to publish. And they are some of the few concrete testaments to the student to the student — y '60s.

Modernized Molière lacks elegance and bite

The St. Lawrence Centre presents Tony Harrison's translation of Molière's The Misanthrope, October 16 - Nov. 10. This new verse translation, first performed at the National Theatre of Great Britain, February 22, 1973, updates the play to 1966 in a very charming, sophisticated and witty manner. Murray Laufer's sets reflect the sophistication of the text, decorating Celimene's apartment with structural sculptures and covering floors and furniture with plush white carpeting. Unfortunately, unable to measure up to the play's satiric wit, the actors sank progressively deeper and deeper into the plush play.

The Misanthrope explores the follies of man as a social and political animal. The play revolves around a select gossip colony which establishes itself in Celimene's Paris apartment. Alceste, a suitor for Celimene, pursues the rocky road of total honesty in his personal and business affairs, and suffers miserably for it, losing lawsuits and love suits. Celimene and her group of ardent admirers and malevolent tongues are served a dose of their own medicine, but, though they suffer for a time, they rejoin the game. Alceste, the misanthropic hero, decides to leave the human race behind him, and there the play ends.

On the St. Lawrence stage, the actors saw fit to leave their craft behind them. They appeared uncomfortable in their roles, seeming to play with forced fun. Harrison's very fine verse was lost, garbled or rattled off unintelligibly by almost everyone. Uniformly, the production lacked the sophistication of the text, replacing foolishness for satire.

Neil Dainard, Alceste, was probably the worst offender, continually ranting, raving, and rattling verse monotonously, while posturing and attitudinizing in the worst 17th century fashion. Kenneth Wickes and Ron Hastings, as the marquises Acaste and Ciltandre, spoofed the convention of the top, which did not coincide with the 1966 setting. Amazingly, Wickes dropped his phony foppishness at one point and became a truly sophisticated upper crust noble à la Noel Coward to give one of the best readings of the evening, in which he exposed all the social games he played.

Robert Benson, as the "poet" Oronte, gave one of the most believable performances, adequately combining Molière with the 20th century, and more importantly, providing Oronte with a personality through slight quirks, such as nervous laughs, embarrassed grins, and blustering self-righteousness. James B. Douglas, as Alceste's best friend, Philinte, also had a handle on the missing link and generally appeared comfortable and snobbishly bemused by all the carryings on around him.

Denise Fergusson, as Celimene, with Jennifer Phipps, as the purdish Arsinoe, supplied one of the funniest moments in a catty, backstabbing exchange delivered under the flag of friendship. Mr. Fergusson deserves much of the credit for fine moments in this production. She sparkled as a game-playing coquette, masterfully using Harrison's satiric verse, while genuinely seeming to have fun on the stage, which was no easy task, considering the problematic staging.

Albert Millaire's staging seemed at odds with Murray Laufer's settings. There was a great deal of furniture on the set, most of which was never used. In particular, an amber upholstered antique chair, placed center stage amidst an entire set of modern design in white and chrome, looked to have some significance, but remained a mystery, only used in the last act, and then, sparingly. The three playing areas became a merry-go-round of myriad runnings up, down and around the stairways. The staging, like the performances, lacked elegance and dash: panache.

Malice misses sharp edge, but play takes hold

It is appropriate that the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama inaugurates its one hundredth anniversary Hart House production with Robertson Davies' Leaven of Malice. Davies is the Master of University of Toronto's Massey College and a member of the faculty of the Drama Centre. It is perhaps inappropriate that Martin Hunter's production, which runs to October 20, is somewhat less than a total success.

The play, adapted from Davies' novel of the same title, is a reworked version of his Love and Livel which saw the brief light of Broadway in Tyrone Guthrie's and the prim Miss Pearl Vambrace. Over the feud-fed family antagonism between the imperious Mrs. Bridgetower, Sr. and the stentorian Professor Walter Vambrace, the false wedding engagement achieves banner-like proportions. Innuendo, accusation and invective spin a web of malice around the search for the culprit.

Malice, of course, is the essential ingredient in Davies' play. Unfortunately, it is also the only one omitted from the production. If malice had brewed in the academic snobbery of Vambrace, if it had stewed in the social arrogance of Mrs.

with the writer's intentions. As an accusing chorus chanting the credo of malice, Rod Beattie, Judith Hunter, Barry O'Connor and David King insinuate nuances of dark humour with the expertise of finely trained musicians.

The feeling that pervades this second act opening is missing from the rest of the production and from some otherwise fine performances. Rex Southgate, as Professor Vambrace, manages to be simultaneously indignant and amused by the high-level counselor Norman Yarrow, who takes it upon himself to lecture the classics professor on the Oedipal complex that seems to permeate the relationship between the professor and Pearl. Marvin Karon, as the presumptuous Yarrow, superbly masters the art of underplaying and the "throw-away" line.

Michael J. Sidnel is a delight as the energetic and irreverent choirmaster, Humphrey Cobbler, who cures his colds by prescribing his own remedy: stay in your quilt-covered brass bed, get plenty of rest with your yoga-practising wife and drink plenty of rye - especially if the last is gaily provided by friend-in-need, Solly Bridgetower.

As Solly, K. Reed Needles needs both advice and consolation, receiving much of the former from Cobbler and a great deal of the latter from his bottle. As actor, Needles is in need of neither. He proceeds to become convincingly drunk, breaks for a serious flashback, and adeptly returns as the besotten Solly, who collapses in a stupor at the foot of Cobbler's brass bed.

Irene Blum's comic performance as the mousey husband-searching Edith Little is definitely memorable, while Joyce Fider's Pearl Vambrace is eminently forgettable.

Most of the play's considerable visual impact is the result of Lawrence Schafer's stunning design concept, which included a succession of breathtaking slide projections which enriched Martin Hunter's finely handled staging.

If director Hunter had taken as much care in his interpretation of Davies' play, as he obviously has with its staging, Leaven of Malice in the words of Humphrey Cobbler, would need "no explanations and no apologies".

Why are you reading this?

By JOHN McANDREW

Five reasons why not to go to the plays

- Who ever heard of these people?
- Movies are in colour.
- It is hard to make out at plays.
- Not only do you have to look at the actors, at intermission you have to look at the audience.
- Only in the movies will you find horses and cars adequately represented.

There are three kinds of theatre: (a) tragedies (b) comedies (c) musicals.

(a) Tragedies can be spotted because the actors talk loud and slower. They are usually in some sort of trouble at home and have to come and stand around the temple to figure things out. Aristotle teaches us to be moved by a combination of fear and loathing.

(b) Comedies have bright lights and faster talk among two or more players. One player is designated "laugh-receiver" and the rest run interference for him, asking questions on the audience's mind; eg. "Who was that lady I saw you with last night?" etc.

These players will stand without moving whenever there is noise in the audience.

(c) Musicals are designed to give the impression of being fun to be in. They are a good way to meet girls. Or boys. The very best musicals also have a strong message as in "Girls should talk better, or "Jesus sure could sing and dance for a carenter."

Theatre today has two main patrons: government grants and guys with dates. The government does this to keep the actors from hanging around the streets; the guy with the date to give the impression of being about town. Popular with the latter is (a) the revue, (b) the cabaret, and (c) the club where you can see legs up close.

(a) The revue is designed to show actors in some of their best clothes and co-ordinates. Here teeth play an important part as in the grin cheeky, the grin wan, the grin sincere and the grin curtain-call.

(b) The cabaret was invented by the Nazis so they could have some place to wear their outfits to. Here were found performers with pale white faces, yellow teeth and a general run-down appearance. This made the Nazis feel like snappy dressers and the master race.

(c) The club was invented by American gangsters to give big stars a place to retire from and make comebacks at. These establishments favour songs about how a person has to be himself and do it his way, and songs called "torch" usually centered around a drinking problem.

Fine acting saves overwritten Kiosk

The Toronto theatre scene is more exciting and varied this fall than in any previous year with over 30 professional and amateur productions on stage this week alone.

One of the more interesting theatre events in this wide range of classical to avant guard repertoire is Hrant Alianak's Noah's Kiosk at Theatre Passe Muraille until the end of this month. Toronto theatre buffs may remember Alianak's powerful surrealist four Tantrums at TPM last March. Critic Urjo Kareada at that time somewhat exaggeratedly called the suspense of one of the pieces unparalleled in recent Toronto theatrical history.

Kareada was less kind to Alianak's Noah's Kiosk, calling it dreary surrealism and a bankrupt parody of the Gothic genre. Kiosk is actually none of these. The play is a historical wax museum come to life whose doll like figures live in a world of their own and only tangentially relate to the U.S. Civil War events melodramatically advertised by an invisible midway hawker.

Unlike Tantrums which consisted of four sequences of social and personal breakdown frequently invoking Maeterlinckian metaphysical terror, Kiosk is completely theatrical. The play repeatedly frustrates our attempts to infuse it with sociological or universal dramatic meaning. In the opening scene, for instance, Mr. and Mrs. Melchior and their three daughters sit frozen facing the audience while an invisible maestro plays a Beethoven sonata on a foot high Baldwin piano. Slowly the rhythm of the music brings the stiff figures to life. They smile, rhythmically move their heads and feet until the concert breaks up because the youngest daughter, Marie La Petite, has to rush to the bathroom.

Each of the succeeding scenes, from the appearance of a witch doctor, the murder of a Spanish and English courtier to the antics of a live skeleton, is similarly paced and motivated by a musical theme that creates the tone and logic of the action. The use of French, Spanish and African speech, painted faces, exaggerated gestures and facial grimaces in Paul Williams' abstract box set creates a dadaist cacophony and puppet theatre mime perfectly in tune with the musical accompaniment and absurdity of the action.

Author-director Alianak's production, while stylistically consistent, is overwritten and much too subjective. Although Kiosk at times did remind me of Jarry's Ubu Roi the play's theatricalism is so self contained that Alianak's comic talent frequently fails because we don't know what he is parodying.

Only in the final scene in which the constantly fighting family, particularly the mistreated Marie La Petite, is reconciled to one another do we feel anything like affection and pity for the characters on stage. Michael Horwood's music is particularly poignant and moving at this point as the cyclical action of the play completes itself and the curtain falls.

Probably the most exciting aspect of this production is the acting of Alianak's cast, all of which studied their non-realistic acting style with Eli Rill. Peter Kelly as the harried Mr. Melchior, Martha Gibson as his Southern belle wife, and their three raggedy Ann doll daughters, Iris Sedore, Kathy, and Anne-Marie Martin, were particularly resourceful and inspiring.

Blues meet gold in Pointer Sisters LP

Old Songs
The Pointer Sisters
Blue Thumb Records

The Pointer Sisters are recent—until this spring these four sisters, daughters of an Oakland California preacher, were merely a back-up group on a few records, like Taj Mahal's Recycling the Blues and Other Related Stuff. On the Taj Mahal album, the Pointers' background vocals to Texas Woman Blues' was one of the few high points.

Then they got the big chance, replacing an act which failed to appear, and there was no holding them back. I first saw them on the Helen Reddy show doing 'Pains and Tears' (on this album) and was astounded. I didn't think that performers with that much class were allowed on television. The precision, the polish was obviously the result of a great amount of work, but at the same time the arrangement was highly imaginative, and allowed for flights by each of the four.

On this album, 'Old Songs' is an example of what the Pointer Sisters do best—'cabaret' tunes, reminiscent of the 1920's and 1930's, Gershwin. The Sisters turn their backs on rock and roll. "And that rock'n roll, you know, it doesn't do a thing to me."

Not all of the songs on the album are intended to fall into the cabaret, or 'show' category. Those which do not, however, seem to have been included largely as 'something for everybody', and, for whatever reason, do not completely succeed. Allen Toussaint's 'Yes We Can-Can' and Willie Dixon's rhythm-and-blues 'Wang Dang Doodle' both run too long, more than the tunes themselves can sustain. Neither song is bad, in fact 'Yes We Can-Can' at half the length would have been really strong. This is a debut album, and the Pointer Sisters may still be feeling their way.

Lyrics are a problem with several of the songs, but none is uninteresting melodically, with the exception perhaps of 'River Boulevard'. A specialty is songs at top speed, including 'Cloud-burst', which I preferred in this incarnation to the Lambert, Hendricks and Ross original. The most ambitious track is 'That's How I Feel', by jazz bassist Wilton Felder (he plays on Joni Mitchell's 'For the Roses'), which has no words, and almost no instrumentation, 'simply' seven minutes of gorgeous jazz vocal. This is a tour-de-force.

Scatting is not new, but most of its practitioners are not that well-known to a younger audience. The Pointer Sisters are in the tradition.

Decimated Allmans regroup and restart

Brothers and Sisters
The Allman Brothers
Capricorn/WEA; $6.29

Right from the opening cut the new Allman Brothers album reassures the listener that the band has not lost any of its drive or ability. The death of Duane Allman two years ago, probably the best guitar player at the time, followed by the death of bassist Berry Oakley, a year later, would have destroyed an average band. But the Allmans have survived, and with the addition of two new members they sound as good as ever.

After playing lead guitar in the shadow of the more flamboyant Duane Allman, Richard Betts finally gets a chance to front the band instrumentally as well as providing four of the seven compositions on Brothers and Sisters. His new role allows him to fully develop the singing and playing on "Ramblin' Man" while the whole band displays their skills in the instrumentally complex "Jessica". Singing and playing dobro on the acoustic "Pony Boy" Betts and the band come the closest yet to a true country song.

In contrast to the development and emergence of Betts as a leader, Greg Allman seems to have settled back into a more supporting role. He does a fine job on his own "Wasted Words" and on "Come and Go Blues", but fails to really contribute anything to Betts' "Southbound". It could be said that the expansion of the band has allowed Betts to take on a bigger share of the load, while Allman is freed to improvise and develop his own solo LP.

Lamar Williams on bass has the skill required to fit into the gap left by Oakley's death. Check out his playing on "Come and Go Blues" and compare it to the similarly styled "Wasted Words" with Oakley on bass. On piano, Chuck Leavell, the other addition, provides the band with an instrument that balances out and contrasts Allmans' organ playing. His inventive playing on "Jessica" and "Pony Boy" is a boost for the band and a treat for the listener.

This is the fifth album for the Allman Brothers, but in a way it can be considered a new starting point for an enlarged and still improving band.

Heavy sound back with lightweight lyrics

WARP!G: WARP!G
London

Listening to this LP takes me back a few years, back to the time when hard, heavy rock was king and the sounds of Led Zeppelin, Grand Funk and Black Sabbath were blasting over the airways. It's all here again on one record, for your listening pleasure.

This four-man band from London, Ontario, has everything down pat, from the roaring feedback to the screeching singer and they even include the obligatory death-rock tune. But unfortunately the material is dated; in fact this album is a re-mixed version of an older record, released a couple of years ago by a smaller company.

Warp!g, and the seven songs they offer, are for the true, devoted fans of the genre. Even the devoted, though, must suffer through the pointless lyrics and the horrible singing.

Musical newcomer Cheryl Dilcher has moved with the times. But old-timer Ellie Greenwich still hangs on to her guy's hand.

Two women: but one's still stuck in mush

Butterfly
Cheryl Dilcher
A & M; $6.29

It requires an act of some courage to venture beyond the cover of this album — a cover which depicts a distinctly saccharine scene, suitable as wallpaper for a child's bedroom were it not dominated by an alarming pair of eyes in the shape of a butterfly. However, if you steel yourself against the jacket and ignore A&M's misguided promotion job ("Eventually Cheryl Dilcher wants to paint herself up as a butterfly and rock musically on stage...") you put the record on and... surprise! It's not as bad as all that. But don't get excited.

Cheryl Dilcher is a novice to the music scene. This is her first venture into recording and, in effect, it comes across as exactly that — a first try. On first listening, the album seems to suffer from several faults. There's a sameness to many of the tunes that is perhaps exaggerated by the 12-string acoustic guitar she plays on most of the tracks (pleasant though its sound is). The song structure is undeniably repetitive: soft verse/loud chorus, and fade out.

The album sounds dull.

After several listenings though good points do emerge. The arrangers have done a commendable job of trying to differentiate the tracks: a fragile piano backing on "Rainbow Farm", some really nice electric guitar work on "High", and so on.

And Cheryl Dilcher does have an interesting voice, ranging all the way from a little girl's whisper to a strong, brassy Carly Simon sound.

Even so, by today's standards, the album doesn't quite make it. It has an amateurish quality to it. If you can only afford one new album, buy something else. You can get the only really exceptional song, "High", as a single, and then, assuming you like it, wait for a second album.

But Cheryl Dilcher has promise and, in future, could produce something much better than "Butterfly".

Let It Be Written, Let It Be Sung
Ellie Greenwich

Verve (Polydor); $6.29

If I were forced to abide by the adage, "If you can't say anything nice, don't say anything at all," this review would have to end here. Ellie Greenwich, unlike Cheryl Dilcher, has been around for quite some time. She is known best as a composer of early 60's vintage songs — such favourites as "Chapel Of Love", "Be My Baby", "Wait 'Til My Bobby Gets Home" — you get the drift. Most of these tunes were hits for other people. Remember Lesley Gore, The Ronettes or The Crystals? Ah, nostalgic! Fine in its place. But here we have a new release, consisting entirely of Ellie Greenwich singing these cobweb-laden melodies.

Overall, the album conveys the impression of having died of an overdose of arranging. A case of too many cooks, I fear. Greenwich's voice struggles bravely against this musical barrage, but comes across as merely bland (to be generous). The total effect is one of boredom.

But the most annoying thing about the album is its irrelevancy. I mean, these songs belong to another era, and a totally different female mentality. They emerged from a time when a girl was nothing if she didn't have a guy's hand to hang on to, and somehow having to listen to a 30-ish woman singing about such ideas is absurd. It doesn't even make it as a nostalgia trip. You keep hearing Lesley Gore or The Dixie Cups.

Furthermore, the contrast between this album and Cheryl Dilcher's is remarkable. It extends beyond the musical content into the realm of self-perception. Both are women; both are songwriters. However, Ellie Greenwich is clinging to the simplistic sexuality of the early, 60's while Cheryl Dilcher possesses an independence revealed in the clear-cut image of herself as a woman, conveyed largely by her lyrics, but also, in a more subtle sense, by the music itself. In comparison, Ellie Greenwich's collection sounds all the more antiquated and gutless — Jello music, which nowadays even 12-year-olds are too sophisticated to swallow. If Greenwich seriously wants to pull off some sort of comeback, she should first examine the calendar: she'll discover that it is 1973, and things are changing.

Redbone, Raitt relax crowd at U of T concert

About 950 devoted blues enthusiasts warmly greeted Bonnie Raitt and Leon Redbone, in a relaxed concert last Friday night at Convocation Hall.

Redbone, who was first to perform, played alone while Raitt brought a backup band with the excellent pianist David Maxwell, bassist Daniel "Freebo" Friedberg and drummer David Whitted.

What both Redbone and Raitt share is the ability to stimulate a warm, sincere relationship with the audience. Listeners were patient even although when Raitt was slow between numbers; while she switched guitars or changed her tuning, listeners were still patient. Raitt described the 2000-seat Convocation Hall as being "just like a livingroom" and it was, everybody just sitting around together. Both performers were open to requests from the audience.

Redbone sings old songs, almost forgotten tunes from the '30s and 40s like old Jimmy Rogers tunes.

Although he keeps his guitar work simple and distinctive, what makes the elusive Redbone unique are the changes in his deep voice which becomes raspy, nasal, and scratchy, like an old '30s record. He yodels; he makes trombone-sounding noises. In "Big Time Woman" Redbone sounded like someone who'd been trained in a barbershop quartet.

With a voice that is often distant, Redbone creates another dimension in the past. He almost seems to personify through himself the lives of many southern US black blues singers which were often shrouded in mystery, like that of the late, great Robert Johnson. This works off-stage as well; nobody knows very much but the obvious about Redbone, once a Toronto resident who now lives in Boston.

Bonnie Raitt's voice is like a well-aged, strong rye, mellow, intense and throaty; warmly pulling you in deep, then letting you go; vibrant and airborne.

The 23-year old Raitt demonstrated excellent style on acoustic guitar, especially on the electric slide, matching her music with moving feet and swaying hips.

Raitt's warmth and vibrancy released the raw sexuality in blues.

But she didn't restrict herself to blues. Before the audience brought Raitt back to sing her favourite song, Bud Johnson's "Since I Fell For You" from the '60s, her last number was an old Motown hit by Martha and the Vandellas titled "Girl You've Been In Love Too Long".

Lots of boozing, sex, but that's not blues

Unlucky Boy
Chicken Shack
London; $6.29

Unlucky, indeed. Another bad British blues band.

Only two of the five current members of the band played on their album, Imagination Lady, but it doesn't matter. The change is superficial, since the group's focus is still Stan Webb. On this LP Webb plays lead guitar, sings, he also wrote six of the nine tunes. That's a heavy disadvantage for the rest of the band to overcome.

The tunes are very thin gruel. The solos don't go anywhere. On the long "Jammin With the Ash", the pianist, Tony Ashton, reveals himself to be a member of the shattering-glass school of piano playing.

As for the lyrics... We quote from "Revelation": "A churning inside of my soul My face is so young But my body is old." This is sung as a standard slow blues. Half of the problem is that Chicken Shack has no idea of what a blues band is about.

Blues is a reflection of a certain culture, or at the least, a certain attitude to life. Songs about drinking and screwing do not a culture make.

This leaves me in a bit of a bind. How do I say that the best song on the album was Jimmy McCracklin's "He Knows the Rules", a song about statutory rape? Nevertheless, it gives me pleasure to report that there was one occasion when the band seemed to be enjoying themselves, instead of mechanically cranking the music out. It only lasts three minutes and thirty-five seconds, and it's the last song on the second side.

Bad news department: records are made from vinyl. Vinyl is based on PolyvinylChloride, which in turn comes from gasoline. You know, petrol, crude, black gold. If you're perceptive you may have noticed something in the dailies about a shortage of the stuff, and sure enough, this is hitting the record industry. A good many of the companies have contracts with the petroleum suppliers which expire as of Dec. 31 this year. Now, aside from the shortage of gas, there's a war on, and all these nasty factors point to one thing — after Christmas, the pricing situation is going to jump so high it'll set your teeth on edge. I don't like to preach gloom and doom in this column, especially as there's no great shortage of it in the rest of this worthy journal, but this is for real. Getcher discs while ya can, kids, cause there's a-gonna be trouble come the new year.

Non-bad news department: there's a great deal in live, unrecorded music happening in town this week, a great deal of it on the campus. Tonight at 8:15 in the concert hall of the Edward Johnson Building (behind the planetarium) pianist Tilu Haamer is giving a recital, as part of the faculty of Music's ongoing series of Student Recitals. It's free, with no tickets required, as are all student shows at the EJB.

Saturday night at 8:30 is the first in a series of three concerts commemorating the inauguration of the new organ at the Edward Johnson Building. The instrument is a new Casavant, Canadian-built, and the concert will feature organists Charles Peaker and Mireille Lagace. Tickets are only $1.50 and the evening should be historic for the Faculty, who have been busting their backs to get this instrument for years. As things stand, it isn't paid off yet, and the proceeds of this concert, and the next two, will go towards the organ fund.

Sunday night is the first concert of the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada. Set for 8:30 in the Great Hall of Hart House, the evening will feature Bob Aitken, one of the best and most imaginative flute players in the country. It's an all-Bach program, and student tickets are just two bucks, available at Hart House. As with all productions which offer a reduced rate for students, it's advisable to bring your ATL card with you when you buy tickets.

Next Thursday is ethnic day at the EJB, with Music From Iran the featured attraction. At 8:30 this ensemble of ouds, santurs, zarbs and other exotic eastern instruments (remember these words for your next Scrabble game!) can be heard in the Concert Hall. A good bet, though is the 2:10 p.m. concert preview of this group, which accompanies a lecture — demonstration of the instruments, which may prove even more interesting for those wanting to delve a little further into the mysterious east. Two claims for the evening show, effendi.

The Toronto Symphony gets moving on its 52nd season this week, having assembled the "greatest array of international young conductors ever." The tragic death of Karel Ancerl this summer left the year's program up in the air, but one can hope that Maestro Ancerl would have been pleased to have given these young artists a chance to perform with a top-class group like the TSO. This Tuesday and Wednesday, the conductor of the Edmonton Symphony, Canadian-born Pierre Hétu, will lead the orchestra in Berlioz' Overture "Benvenuto Cellini", "Fantasmes" by Andre Prevost, and Brahms' Violin Concerto, with soloist Nathan Milstein, a star of international repute. 8:30 at Massey Hall, but if you don't have tickets now, try to get them soon, because (more often than not) come the night of the performance there aren't any to be had, or they're all right in the expensive spots. The peasant gallery goes for $3.00.

Finally, the CBC rounds out the week in gloriously cheap fashion. Neither vinyl shortage nor money famine can keep these intrepid souls off the air. Wednesday at 6:30 p.m., organist Mireille Lagace (heard on Saturday at the inaugural organ concert) can be heard at the convention of the Royal Canadian Organists' College. At 8 the same evening, a special UN Day concert can be heard live from New York featuring the great pianist Sviatoslav Richter and the Leningrad Symphony.

Thursday evening at 8 there's a profile of Jon Vickers, the internationally-acclaimed Canadian tenor. Vickers is a luminary of such places as the Met, Vienna and London, and this one-hour show should be a revealing look inside the career of the former yeast salesman from Prince Albert who went on to become one of the first of Canada's international artists.

Whew. Quite a week.

Two distinctly different plays opened in Toronto this week but with each the stress is on language; used as part of a social game or as a tool of indoctrinal communication. Albert Millaire, one of the leading figures in contemporary French Canadian Theatre, directs The Misanthrope at the St. Lawrence Centre. Translated by Tony Harrison this version of Molière's play transposes the court of Louis XIV into that of Charles de Gaulle and sets the production in 1966, exactly three hundred years after its first performance in 1666. The Misanthrope deals with an idealist, Alceste, who delivers verbose attacks upon the hypocritical, self-satisfied society of his day but finds himself in love with one of its most unprincipled social hostesses. The second new play Kaspar delves more deeply into the power of social linguistics.

Last night the Firehall Theatre, at 70 Berkeley Street, gave the first Canadian production in English of Kaspar by Peter Handke. Using the half-puppet, half-clown, half-human form of Kaspar, the play explores the connection between thought and language. As Kaspar learns the possibilities of co-ordinated speech and consciousness he is re-born as a social animal but as he struggles to transcend the limitation of his language and socialization he is destroyed by the same process which created him. The play has been compared in importance to Waiting For Godot. Running until Nov. 3, it will be interesting to see how it fares in this first Robbie Robertson of The Band who produced his first album on the Bearsville label. That 1971 LP, which was engineered by boy-wonder, Todd Rundgren and included such musicians as Robertson, Levon Helm and David Rea, never did sell all that well and has remained an overlooked masterpiece. It includes Jesse's most well known songs, "The Brand New Tennessee Waltz" and "Yankee Lady". A second album titled Third Down, 110 To Go was released last year and again was unfortunately passed over by most reviewers. Jesse Winchester comes to Convocation Hall on Sunday at 8 pm in a SAC sponsored concert. His performance is worth all of the $3 admission price and more.

Audiences at the Riverboat, 134 Yorkville (922-6216) will be in the hands of ex-Guess Whoer, Chad Allen tonight and tomorrow. Next week is a bit more interesting. John Renbourn (formerly with Pentangle) and Jaqi McShee open on Tuesday. Admission is $3.50.

Pricilla Herdman, an English and American traditional singer, and Scottish folk singer, Hamish Imlach are at Fiddler's Green tonight. Admission is $1 and more details are available by calling 489-3001 in the evenings.

One of the more unique performers playing in the city this weekend is Alan Stivell. As a Breton who plays the Celtic music, (from Brittany, Ireland and Wales) of his ancestors, Stivell is certainly an original in today's pop/folk genre. Stivell accompanies himself on the Celtic harp (a medieval instrument with steel strings) as well as a number of other odd instruments. He's recorded several albums on Polydor, and enjoys a loyal following in Europe and Quebec. Stivell makes his Toronto premiere tomorrow night at 8:30 pm at Seneca College's Minkler Auditorium (491-8877). Another concert performance will take place on Sunday evening, 8:30 pm at Town Hall, St. Lawrence Centre (366-7723).

The Canadian Entertainment Exposition at the Queen Elizabeth Building, in the CNE, tonight through Sunday, is a scheme by Toronto promoter Joey Cee to provide an inside glance into many aspects of the music industry. Aside from the usual stereo-show displays of equipment, there will be representatives of record companies, booking agents, music publishers and artists on hand to discuss their specialties. There will also be live performances by such people as, Bill King, Bob McBride, Chad Allen and Lorence Hud as well as many others that you would never want to listen to in your entire life. Admission to all this fun is a mere $1.50 with a student card.

The disturbing show presently at the Art Gallery of Ontario Art and Landscape of Italy, too late to be saved? continues through the 28th. I highly recommend it.

The retrospective of anemic drawings and paintings by Daniel Hanequand and the Hart House Gallery closes tomorrow but I feel behooved to comment. The artistic deliberately renders everything puffy and indefinite. I can't help but feel that the vagueness comes from a lack of conviction and that there's very little of substance behind that all-enveloping mist, and that an injustice has been committed against dreams and mysteries. Hanequand's technique is by no means unique. We see it all the time on rock album covers and on popular posters.

Erindale professor David Blackwood is a printmaker and illustrator with a good feel for his media, a sense of drama and a command over his subject matter: Newfoundland coastal scenery and mythology. He's presently showing at the Gallery Pascal, 104 Yorkville through the 31st. As show of recent works by seminal abstract-expressionist Adolph Gottlieb opened Wednesday at the Marlborough-Godard Gallery, With Rothko, Hoffman and Pollock all dead, he's one of the last surviving originators of the movement and is a genius.

Ivey applauds Varsity publicity

I welcome the publicity given by your article on page 3 of The Varsity of October 17 to the rash of thefts of art objects and other items from New College.

There is one error of fact that should be corrected. The article states "It appears that city police have not been called in on the case—Ivey prefers to keep the investigation within the University." This is certainly not the case. All thefts are reported to the university police, and through them the city police. Unfortunately once the property has left the college buildings the possibility of recovery is apparently small. The purpose of my letter to all college members was to encourage them to accept responsibility for reporting apparent thefts or other incidents in order to try to prevent their occurrence.

Our press-gang holds its own

The statements in your issue of October 15 with regard to the University of Toronto Press require clarification. The University does not subsidize the printing, publishing, or bookstore operations of the Press, which pays commercial rates on its loans, and defrays all of its own expenses. Any margin derived from the printing and publishing divisions is applied to the subsidization of scholarly publishing; in recent years, this has amounted to $200,000 annually. Until very recently, the Press also met the annual losses of the Bookstores; the latter are now, fortunately, breaking even.

LSAT fair to our law students

It has been brought to my attention that The Varsity of October 3 contained an article commenting on the admissions tests written by applicants for the University of Toronto Faculties of Medicine and Law. The paragraph concerning the Law School Admission Test is misleading.

All applicants for admission to the first year of the Faculty of Law are required to write the Law School Admission Test which is administered by the Educational Testing Service of Princeton, New Jersey. The test is an aptitude test. The questions are designed to measure the applicant's ability to read, understand and reason logically using a variety of verbal, quantitative and symbolic materials. The test is also designed to measure skill in using standard written English to express ideas clearly, precisely and fluently. It involves an assessment of skills rather than knowledge of specific subjects.

The Service for Admission to College and University was commissioned by the Ontario Department of University Affairs in March, 1971 to examine the suitability for Canadian students of the Law School Admission Test. The studies on item bias concluded that the test could be used with equal appropriateness for Canadian or American students. There was no evidence that either group was disadvantaged on the test relative to the other. In group connection with the SACU study, a number of Canadian law professors reviewed the test and came to the conclusion that the contents of the test would not bias the performance of Canadian students.

The Educational Testing Service has stringent security requirements for all phases of the test administration. No one is permitted to examine the contents before or after the examination. Only the candidates see the test questions, and then only during the actual administration. However, the Law School Admission Bulletin which every applicant receives free contains a number of sample questions and the Pre-Law Handbook which is available to applicants contains a full length composite law school admission test consisting of questions drawn from previous tests.

Marie T. Huxter,
Director of Admissions,
Faculty of Law.

Grindal's albatross is insignificant

As a student who took two evening courses last summer, I was surprised to read that the Department of University Extension had been accused by Norma Grindal of offering inferior courses. Nothing could be further from my experience. I found both professors and students able and enthusiastic. Indeed, the smallness of the classes permitted a kind of teaching usually not experienced in day courses.

Moreover, I don't see how her suggestion to draft a psychology professor to supplant an able and effective Director would be of any value. Apparently, as Ms. Grindal, herself, says, "The issue of image has been an albatross around our neck". It is, indeed, unfortunate that as an Academic Affairs Governor, Ms. Grindal should be so preoccupied with insignificant problems of status.

I am objecting to the policy by which the photocopy service in the John P. Roberts Library operates. Students are charged for the amount of information copied, not for the materials consumed or labour involved. Fees are 10 cents (five for students) for each book page duplicated, not for each copy made. A non-student might pay as much as 20 cents for one photocopy, which is exorbitant. At O.I.S.E., anyone may have copies made for six cents each. Thus, customers at the J.P.R. who do not waste half of a copy are charged more than those who do.

The cost of one photocopy to the university is in no way related to how much print it duplicates. Certainly a justifiable profit should be made, but why aren't fees commensurate with the cost of materials and labour? Surely our administrators cannot wish to give us the impression that the university is, at least in this instance, a mere information vendor, or that they are more concerned with commercial enterprise than with learning and scholarship.

James Bay project is raw deal for many

By DAVID SIMMONDS

If Robert Bourassa thinks he's frustrated by his contempt of court citation, he should talk to the native people's associations.

The campaign against the massive Hydro-electric development at James Bay has been effectively stifled, pending delivery of judgement on an injunction brought by the Native People's Associations of Quebec to have the project stopped.

The court action was initiated in December, 1972, and the case wound up in July. According to Gordon Lee, director of the Canadian Association in Support of Native Peoples, regular two-week delays in announcement of the judgement have been given.

This will probably mean that the decision will be handed down after the Quebec elections, and possibly not until after work on the project has finished for the winter.

Any one of the parties involved in the court case who speaks out on the project while judgement is still pending finds himself in contempt of court. This is what happened to Bourassa, who, having just published a new book which described the project's inevitability, found himself issued with a summons.

To save him the embarrassment of making a court appearance during the election, Bourassa's lawyers have feverishly worked on a successful delay of his appearance.

About the only role that the campaign against the project can adopt at present is one of education. Thus there recently appeared the book, James Bay Forum, a transcript of one of the public hearings on the project held in Montreal.

The James Bay project was announced by Bourassa in April of 1971, to the wide screen theme of "the world begins today."

The announcement followed Bourassa's less than spectacular performance on the FLQ crisis, and the seeming absence of the 100,000 jobs that he had promised during his first election campaign. Moreover, he announced the project despite the advice of reports that energy needs could be satisfied until 1979.

Since the announcement and the subsequent start of construction on the project, a wide range of alarming concerns have been expressed.

First and foremost, the Cree people and their way of life will be substantially affected, if not destroyed.

In fact, the Indians of Quebec had planned to appeal to the United Nations on the basis of the 1948 genocide convention.

It was on the grounds of aboriginal title to the land that the federal

"The development of the James Bay territory represents for Quebec, for you, for all of us, the opportunity of the century. There are few places in the world where a young nation has the chance to take up a challenge of such scope — a challenge — and I emphasize this — which will influence every aspect of our economic life, our technological strength, our prosperity, and our individual futures"

Pierre Nadeau,
President,

James Bay Development Corporation,
January 18/1972.

government has supported the Indians' case at a financial level.

A May 1972 government report (now withdrawn from circulation) found that "the government may have both the legal capability and the responsibility to protect the interests of Indians affected;" and further found that "the unsundered rights of the Indians constitute property rights which cannot be altered by unilateral action of the province". The documents recently stolen from the department of Indian affairs and northern development — and summarized in The Varsity on Wednesday — reveal that the federal government was prepared to take a more active stance on behalf of the Indians, until strong pressure from Robert Bourassa forced them to back down.

The environmental impact of the project was not studied at all before it was announced. A report on the ecological impact of the project, commissioned by the native peoples, recommended "reconsideration of the advisability of the entire scheme." Aside from the fact that habitat will be destroyed in the path of the development, other experts have predicted it will cause significant climatic shifts.

Damming of water sources to James Bay could delay the spring ice break up, resulting in a longer winter, which would affect more than Quebec alone. Salmon spawning (an area of international agreement) could also be seriously interrupted.

Financially, latest projections have the project costing more than 10 billion dollars. The bulk of the financing is to come from foreign sources, primarily the house of Rothschild. The Rothschild group is making an investment with high interest rates, while its capital is guaranteed by the province of Quebec and the James Bay Development Corporation.

James Gillies, the Conservative finance critic, has estimated that the influx of foreign capital necessary to finance the project will produce an "almost unmanageable economic situation by 1978".

Although Bourassa has claimed that the energy from the James Bay project will not be exported, he recently signed an export contract with Consolidated Edison of New York. According to Gordon Lee, Bourassa has also denied the claim by economist Kari Levitt that the Brinco consortium plans to build a uranium enrichment complex in the region, which would have a high energy demand.

Province raises grad grants, fewer eligible

The provincial government will be supporting 50 per cent fewer graduate students financially during the 1974-75 academic year under the new Ontario Graduate Scholarship Program, announced by Jack McNie, minister of colleges and universities.

Under the current Graduate Fellowship Program, which will expire at the end of the current academic year, Queen's Park was spending $3 million per year distributed among 2,000 graduate students in the province, down from the $5 million available in the 1970-7

However, the new program will distribute $3 million among 1,000 graduate students. On result of this will be that graduate students will have their maximum grant increased to $3,500 per year from the current maximum of $2,250.

Each of Ontario's provincially-sponsored universities — U of T is one of the 15 involved — will nominate 10 students to receive the award to study at that university.

The remaining 850 grants will be given out to students who have applied by Dec. 1 for scholarships commencing in May, September or January, 1975.

Academic requirements have also been changed, according to McNie. Previously, second class standing was the minimum qualification, but now applicants must have first class standing in their major subject areas.

The academic fields to be covered have been expanded. The new program is for all studies except theology.

The current program has excluded such fields as medicine, dentistry, education, home economics, social work, journalism, public administration and business administration.

There has been a decrease in the total amount of money provided by the government in recent years.

One likely effect of the new program is that more graduate students may attend smaller universities. The old system required students to study at a given university.

The new one requires the 150 award winners nominated by universities to attend at the university which nominated them, but the 850 at-large winners will be free to study at any of the 15 provincially-supported universities in Ontario.

Recipients of the grants will receive $800 a term plus fees and expenses to the total of $3,500 and must re-apply each year to a total of four years.

The awards are designed mainly for Canadian citizens. Only 10 per cent of them may go to landed immigrants or persons holding student visas. The education ministry says preference will be given to Ontario residents.

Businessmen and Rotarians meet for survival

By DAVID SIMMONDS

The president of Rotary International and the policy planning director of the World Bank have something in common.

They both saw fit to come to Toronto on Wednesday to address the $7-a-plate "leadership dinner" held by the Survival Institute of Canada, at the plush Canadian Room of the Royal York Hotel.

The Survival Institute of Canada was formed in 1972, after the Stockholm Conference on the Environment, by Vernon Heaslip, a Rotarian and general manager of Belmont Construction Co. Last May, a "Group of 50" academics and professionals was convened to draft the Canadian Plan for Survival, a document released to the press two weeks ago.

The plan, which its authors say "represents the initiative of a group of concerned Canadians towards the survival of life on this planet," makes broad recommendations in the areas of pollution, urban problems and transportation, Canadian problems, social and economic policies, resource management and education. (See the Varsity, Oct. 10). The leadership dinner was attended by more than 1,000 people, most representing local Rotary Clubs. All of the guests appeared to be surviving quite handsily.

William Carter, the president of Rotary International, suggested to the dinner guests that they were witnessing a "moment of history," and that the Canadian plan for survival was an "inspiring and enlightened document," which would restore a proper sense of stewardship to the world. Carter plans to stump for the Canadian plan for survival on his worldwide speedmaking tours for Rotary International.

Carter was followed at the rostrum by Habbub ul Haq, policy planning director of the World Bank. Haq implored the audience to consider the two thirds of humanity which did not have the luxury to consider improving the environment. He said that while the Canadian plan for survival was a "useful initiative," "Canadian survival cannot be insured unless the world survival is insured first."

Haq warned that rich and poor nations were set on the path of confrontation, which would continue unless the developed countries adopted a policy of "enlightened self interest." He suggested that industry cannot afford to ignore the interests of labour, as it learned to its detriment during the depression.

Dr. Louis Renzoni, vice president of the International Nickel Company of Canada, stated that the "industrial community will do its best" to improve environmental quality.

However, Dr. Renzoni advocated the mining of present metal reserves in order to build up a world utility stock. "Economic growth and industrial development are essential in the short term," he said.

Vernon Heaslip, founder of the institute, made an energetic plea for individual and corporate contributions to the survival institute. And to the strains of "home on the range" and "shine on harvest moon," out came checkbooks and pens from the erstwhile diners.

Among the head table guests who appeared rather pained at this point in the proceedings was John Evans, president of the University of Toronto. Evans asked if he was endorsing the plan for survival said that he was merely invited as a guest, and had not endorsed the plan.

It remains to be seen how the other head table guests representing Canada Permanent Trust, American Can of Canada, Continental Can Company of Canada, the Steel Company of Canada, Wood Gundy Ltd., The Toronto Dominion Bank and International Nickel will react to the plea for corporate charity. Heaslip stressed that he wanted corporations to support ongoing groups of 50 to keep the survival plan up to date.

Ken Valentine of the Canadian Labour Congress then addressed the dinner. He stated that it was unrealistic to expect a worker surviving on a day to day basis to worry about the survival of the human race.

However, he said that labor had been "led down the garden path" and had been "wedded to growth for too long." He ended his speech by advocating "resources for people rather than profits," and received a strong round of applause for doing so.

Chris Taylor of the University of Toronto suggested that the Survival Institute had a threefold function. It could unite environmental groups, engage in a process of continuous review, and act as a research organization.

Fac Ass'n says no students

By KEN GREEN

Bill Nelson, president of the U of T Faculty Association, said Tuesday that the association's position on student participation on tenure committees is that students should not sit on the committees.

Nelson said that he and a minority of the association council which drew up the report are "not opposed personally" to student representation, but that no minority report will be filed with the association's majority report.

However, Nelson said that while the report indicates student opinion is important, the report does not include a procedure for considering student views.

While not personally opposed to student participation, Nelson said, he will accept the majority position of no student input.

He said that during the council's year-long consideration of the issue, they did not take into account student pressure for representation. Nelson indicated he does not feel the pressure aids the student cause.

He said the original executive report called for partial student representation on tenure committees, but the council amended that clause by a 10-8 vote to eliminate recommending students on the bodies.

He said the final report was never voted on by the total body.

Bill Nelson, Faculty Association president.

Gov says no housing problem

TORONTO (CUP) - Ryerson Polytechnical Institute will not get the new student residence its administration wants, if an Ontario Ministry of Colleges and Universities report is accepted.

The ministry will publish a report dealing with the residence situation throughout Ontario in about a month. But the Eyepener, the Ryerson student newspaper, recently learned the report's contents.

The report says the need for new residences is nominal and the government should give no special priority to student housing over other social needs.

The ministry commissioned the report almost one year ago when it suspended all capital expenditures for Ontario universities and colleges. The report says residence occupancy rates are low, especially in northern Ontario.

Though the report says student housing needs should be continually re-evaluated, no new residences are foreseen.

The report did not examine the reasons for the low occupancy rates last year nor did it analyse the housing needs of students attending community colleges.

Current legislation prohibits community colleges from building student residences and, since the ministry report only studied existing residences, community colleges were not included.

"The report found that in some areas of the province, such as Waterloo and Guelph, vacancy rates ran as high as 20 per cent. The report concluded that there was not a problem as far as student housing went but the study must go through the apparatus of the ministry before a final decision is made," a ministry source said.

Most of the money required to build student accommodation comes from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the form of loans of up to 90 per cent of the required building costs. The residence must be self-supporting or the university must make up the deficit.

Before any grants for student housing are made, the university requesting the loan must show the need for additional housing. This study must cover all available housing in the entire municipality in which the educational institution is located.

Many students at Ontario post-secondary institutions have had problems in finding places to live. Many don't want to live in residence and housing outside the institution is often sub-standard or not open to students.

The Ontario Federation of Student (OFS) is demanding the immediate release of this report OFS officials maintain that the report, done last February, was made when post-Christmas drop-outs are at a peak and residences consequently are partially vacant.

Groupies marry

By HEATHER SANGUINS

There is a definite trend today for "traditional marriages and families to open their boundaries," Boston family counsellor and author Joan Constantine said Wednesday night.

She was speaking to a lecture at OCE as a surprise guest instead of the film "Growing Up Female" which was originally scheduled.

Constantine herself has experienced several kinds of marriage, group as well as one that was "very monogamous - to the point of being open." She outlined several other alternatives to two-person marriages then went into detail about one of these group marriages.

Constantine suggested "communalized" marriage where generally several people live together; the terms of which vary greatly. One of these variations in existence to-day are "expanded families" that are commune-like but whose members do not consider themselves to be participants in a commune.

Constantine stressed that in group marriages, although there was "no official ceremony, people considered themselves to be seriously committed."

The speaker indicated the advantages in group marriage for a woman are: growth as an individual, more opportunities to do things (through company and a sharing of money and responsibilities) and greater intellectual stimulation.

From her own experience she stated that before her participation in a group marriage she had "no sense of myself" but that she learned through the experience that she was an "unique and different individual."

This set-up also allowed her husband, Larry, to see the "facets of her that people other than him liked."

Constantine and her husband Larry are co-authors of the newly published Group Marriage. Three years of research went into the book and the authors were involved with eleven distinct family groups during this time, involving 104 people.

She said while group marriages were "all over" the country, they were "very hard to find". The reason for this was that they feel threatened by the interference of the mass media. Constantine pointed out that "if you're different people do attack you, because they are afraid of something that is different, or strange" to them.

Statistically speaking, the speaker pointed out, in the US the average length of a two-person marriage is 7.1 years. For two people who are "living together" the duration is about eighteen months.

Pests are impotent

VANCOUVER (CUP) Genetic mutations may one day be the answer to pest control.

Malcolm FitzEarl, a member of the University of British Columbia (UBC) Zoology department, has been experimentally breeding flies and other insects to develop alternate methods of combating insects.

At a recent lecture, Fitz-Earl told UBC students that, through the rearrangement of their chromosomes, insects can be made partially sterile or no longer the carriers of contagious diseases such as malaria.

"If we could replace an entire bug population with hybrids, we could effectively control population growth," he explained. "In the Okanagan Valley, numbers of certain damaging insects could be reduced to an acceptable level."

He contended that "it is undesirable to eradicate a species entirely because it plays an important role in the food chain". Blackflies and mosquitoes are necessary as food for other species.

The breeding techniques could also be used in the purification of a strain that has become immune to a pesticide. By chromosome rearrangement the insects could be made susceptible again.

Some of the mutants that Fitz-Earl has produced can be affected by temperature changes. The insects are exposed to extreme temperatures early in their development; later temperature change, such as the heat of summer, will paralyze and kill the adults.

complaints about inadequate financing for part-time students," a government spokesman said.

The program, being attempted at four universities and five colleges, is based entirely on students' needs. The Ontario government hopes, if the program is successful, the federal government will be prompted to assist part-time students.

Under the Canada Student Loans Act, part-time students are not eligible for financial assistance. Some provinces, including Ontario, have been urging the federal government to amend this act so it is favourable to part-time students.

A student recommended for a bursary under the program can receive up to the full amount of tuition and related expenses, plus a grant of up to $150.

"The program is not going to aid the average part-time student, but is for those who would like to take part-time studies but cannot afford them," the government spokesman said.

In addition to the bursary program, the government announced that provincially-guaranteed loans will be available for part-time students.

"The program will be for only one year, after which it will be assessed to see if it can continue," the spokesman said.

Gov't co-opts

TORONTO (CUP) — Ontario's part-time students will be the recipients of an experimental government bursary and loan program starting this fall.

The one year program will be restricted to single parents, unemployed adults and working people with low incomes. The bursaries will cover programs with credit courses leading to a certificate, diploma or degree.

"The reason for the innovation of a program like this was to act in response to a need. The minister, after visiting many college and university campuses got a number of

In OUAA championship tennis in London Toronto won the team title. Keith Porter and Ross Saldon captured the doubles for Varsity while John Turner of Western was singles champ.

In the first invitational meet of the season, Blues hosted RMC. Queen's, York and Ottawa in waterpolo competition. Game scores were: Toronto 7 - RMC 6; Queen's 10 - York 7; Queen's 12 - Toronto 3. This leaves Toronto and Queen's tied atop the Eastern Division, with RMC a strong third. Next weekend is free; the weekend after is a trip to Ottawa.

In Western Section soccer scoring Mike Czerwinc of Laurentian and Vince Ierullo of Toronto are setting the pace with eight goals apiece. Allan Caramancio of the Blues holds down fifth place with five. In the Eastern Stewart Lawrie of surprise leaders RMC has seven goals while Mac Musaby of York is second with five.

In football scoring Neil Lumsden of Ottawa commands a hefty lead with 69 points based on five TD's, nine field goals, 10 converts and two singles. He still has three games to go to break the season record of 72 held jointly by Brian Warrender and Gord McLellan of Queen's (both in the 1971 season).

Toronto stalwart Cor Doret has an outside chance at his own record - most TD's in a season. That record, 12, is also held by Warrender and McLellan. Doret has two games to go, the last game being here against Ottawa and Neil Lumsden. In spite of its poor 3-3 record, Blues have an exciting and potent offence (189 points, best in the OUAA, 2380 yards total gains) that could easily spring Doret. Dunkley and Brenchley have combined for 14 majors, 1078 yards, and a .563 completion record - best in the OUAA.

NUS needs financial policy

VANCOUVER (CUP) — A University of British Columbia delegate to the up-coming National Union of Students (NUS) conference hopes NUS will establish a united Canadian student financial policy.

UBC external affairs officer, Bonnie Long, said a NUS financial policy must meet the needs of all students.

NUS is an association of about 24 Canadian universities and colleges which hopes to present a united front on common student interests. Its constitutional purpose is "to defend and advance the interests of Canadian students." NUS was first organized in the summer of 1972 and is holding a national organizational conference in Edmonton during the weekend of October 19.

Long said the conference will propose policy on student housing, unemployment, student representation on regional and provincial governments, and government financing of students' tuition.

Each NUS member institution will have two delegates at the Edmonton conference. However, each delegation will be assigned different voting power depending on the relative size of the institution.

Asylum is necessary: CAUT

The board of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) has called on the Canadian government to provide asylum for refugees from the military coup in Chile both in the Canadian embassy in Santiago and in Canada.

In a statement issued from CAUT's Ottawa office, the faculty organization said:

"The department of external affairs and the department of manpower and immigration (should) handle this matter with the same sense of urgency that very properly was shown in the cases of the refugees from Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Uganda."

The statement said the organization "deplores the current violent attack on freedom, including academic freedom, in Chile and urges the government of Canada to accept the position that Canada has a moral responsibility to aid the victims of the political persecution in Chile."

A report from a Canadian recently returned from Chile indicates that the dean of the faculty of medicine at the University of Santiago was dragged from his dinner table by military officials and has not been seen since.

"Students of Chilean universities are also in great danger," the CAUT statement continued, "and it is strongly recommended that a liberal interpretation of Canadian immigration laws be used to assist students to enter Canada."

PHE mystifies SMC in football

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Under a dark 17th century sky yesterday afternoon, PHE pushed SMC onto an anvil and hammered out a 7-3 win.

At the half, St. Mikes trailed the muscular pagans only 4-3 as both sides successfully emulated the Oakland Raiders football team.

SMC received the opening kickoff and after some strenuous activity, soon lost a fumble on their own 12. Nedoskyko then punched out a 6 yard field goal 3 plays later to give the jocks a 3-0 lead.

The teams then settled down around the midfield environs and for a while seemed content to batter and smash each other into unknown universes.

Finally PHE's Carron pranced willfully behind two defenders and snared a 41 yard bomb. He was demurely gang-tackled at the 18 yard line. The SMC defence stiffened and refused to yield any more of its virtue. Both sides watched the subsequent field goal bounce unsuccessfully off a goal post.

Minutes later, PHE's powerhouse punter Zarembo (cha cha cha!) launched a 45 yarder which landed by general consent in the end zone for a single.

Gnashing their teeth, the SMC offensive mills ground down the yards exceedingly small. Finally, Kluzuski ('71 spelling bee champ) fled downfield to rendezvous with a 40 yard pass, which set up Liscio's field goal to end the half.

In the 3rd quarter the PHE defence resembled a chorus line of blacksmiths as they hammered the Mikes into 3 fumbles and 2 interceptions. Eventually PHE consented to kick another field goal to help themselves to a 7-3 lead.

The final quarter saw a steady drizzle of punts, fumbles and interceptions by both teams which kept everyone fuming at midfield.

Down 4 points in the final 3 minutes, SMC began an unsteady drive which wouldn't have fooled a breathalyzer test. However, on the last play of the game, PHE's Rigi shoplotted a long pass out of a crowd for a timely interception that preserved the win.

A good time was had by all, heckling the erstwhile referee Payl Carson.

By DAVE BAKER

Thursday, Carson's refereeing continued to attract chagrin, particularly his blissful assurance as to his own infallibility. Even his critics must concede that the trend towards chronically limp-wristed refereeing reverses when Paul ties on the togs.

The Vic-Engineering game had little to recommend it aside from a lesson for living. The "Gears" practise longer, later and more often than any other team, but their effort went for naught due to the individual brilliance of "Hot Rod" Hotrum who returned a punt 90 yards for Vic and broke the opposition's heart.

Engineering had taken the lead early on a pass from John Carlson to Dave Williams. After Hotrum's converted heroics, Engineering, never a come-from-behind squad, knocked on the door late as Carlson turned the corner but came up lacking.

Vic held and iced it as Mike Johnson danced down the side lines, dodging brief cases and futile tackles alternately. It should be noted that there was an inordinately large number of briefcases at the game. Final: Vic 14 - Eng 6.

In the other game, the morality play scenario gave way to good ole gridiron heroics, as has been wont to occur with increasing frequency in this year's new look second vidision. Sundial dedication ceremonies claimed the talents of crucial Trinity players, as Meds won 10-8 under menacing skies. Meds appeared unaffected by Trinity's team hoot which covered Orthodox, Catholics, Dissenters, etc., but inexplicably failed to mention doctors.

Thrilled spectators watch hardened athletes battle for manna in endzone

Meds dissected a sweater-tackling Trinity defence with pulse-taking efficiency. QB Terry Bridle ricocheted into the end zone for the TD converted by Paul Blysis, who followed up with a field goal.

Trin QB Dave Wright showed both his inexperience and a strong arm, passing to Geoff Irvine in the deep corner for a TD. At this point Bill Dalziel, Med's captain, threw his helmet to the turf and had to be gang-tackled by half his team to stop him from violating the referee.

After convolutions too complex to relate (you had to be there), Wright passed to Irvine again for a two point conversion. Meds ground out the clock on Don Macdonald's fine running and looked strong at the whistle. Poulos gets a buckeye for Trinity.

Soccer Blues

Scrape By

By TIM BURNS

Toronto soccer Blues continued this season's practice of economising on their goal output by scraping past Waterloo Warriors 1-0 at Varsity Stadium on Wednesday night. As so often this term the Blues' complete territorial domination was negated by incredible extravagance in front of the net.

However, the goal that secured the two points and maintained Toronto's challenge to league leading Laurentian was well made. Immediately after the start of the second half Slimmon was released into space on the right wing. His fine centre deep into a gap at the centre of the Waterloo penalty area was headed in by Burns.

The story of the first half had been one of midfield superiority by Toronto to frustrated by a mixture of poor finishing, off-sides, and injudicious passing in the visitors' defensive zone. Waterloo withdrew an extra defender into a sweeping position beside the centre half. Too often, Toronto passes were attempted through this well covered middle area instead of being hit longer to take advantage of the Waterloo full backs' shortcomings.

When Marcantonio and Burns did manage to strike the ball wider and longer, danger resulted. Marcantonio put Polera away on one occasion but with only the keeper to beat the shot was hurried and wide. A header from Caramanico which appeared to have crossed the line was kicked out by a burly defender. Ierullo burst through on one occasion but held on to the ball instead of shooting and was foiled by a brave goalkeeper.

Waterloo raids were rare and speculative. The home defence had no trouble except of its own making. Crewe at centre back had an outstanding game playing with a combination of forthrightness in the challenge and composure and fine touch on the ball. Slimmon and Dubsky were solid at full back, and Judd in goal displayed his usual courage and steadiness.

The second half was a rerun of the first but with an even greater degree of pressure applied by the home team. Savarino, and Evans when he came on, ran hard and harried the tired Waterloo defence into more mistakes. Following the early goal chance after chance was made and squandered.

The reasons for this were painfully obvious. Blues' forwards shot from acute angles when they had little or no chance of scoring, where a pass was the proper move, and they passed or dribbled on the edge of the area, when a shot was in order. These are elementary principles. But it seems that Blues' forwards need to be drilled in such basics for chances have been thrown away throughout the season for the same reason.

The closest Toronto came to another goal was when a low corner was neatly flicked on by Ierullo and headed against the crossbar by Crewe.

Referendum reaction: So what else is new?

By PAUL McGRATH

"Frankly, I'm not surprised." That was the reaction of New College principal Don Ivey to the results of last week's SAC referendum, in which U of T students voted in favor of student representation on staffing committees.

Ivey said "It's not hard to get support" for the kind of "yes or no" referendum SAC was holding.

"If SAC feels they have their mandate, that's fine," he said, but he implied that the referendum questions were phrased for SAC's desired interpretation. He argued that the questions "could have been more satisfactory."

"I've made it clear that I support the majority position of the Task Force," he said, referring to the Forster report on Academic Appointments, which at best arrived at no decision on the problem of student representation on staffing committees. The report indicated that there was feeling both for and against students being seated on tenure committees, but refused to commit itself to a position because of technical problems involved in ascertaining the best ways to choose students. Another problem was discovering what could be called good teaching.

Last week Ivey admitted that "we don't know what constitutes good teaching."

Referring to the 30-per-cent turnout in the referendum, Ivey said "it's an unfortunate fact that most students on the campus don't care about the issue."

U of T President John Evans made no personal comment on the results of the referendum, only stating that they would result in "vivid discussion" when the Task Force report is presented to the Committee on Academic Affairs in November. Evans said the results would certainly be included in the presentation to the committee.

Evans added that there is "broad student representation" on the Academic Affairs Committee, intimating that the student voice would be heard when the report went into discussion. At present there are eight students on the committee of 50, which decides on matter of curriculum and teaching.

By turning the problem over to the Governing Council, the Forster gang avoided the most contentious issue of recent times at the university. They admitted, without attempt at solution, that the differences of opinion among the faculty and administration were possible "irreconcilable."

The division on the issue has pitted the U of T Faculty Association against members of the Faculty Reform Caucus. Bill Nelson, a history professor and president of the Association, stated last week that the opinion of the association was that students should not sit on tenure committee but that some way should be found for student input. It was hoped that the Forster report would find a way.

Chris Plowright of the Faculty Reform Caucus has stated in the past that he was in favor of student representation.

"I am absolutely furious about the way our tenure committees are presently operated," he said. "The student viewpoint should be properly represented. It is absolutely essential that these committees hear student opinions."

SAC's position, outlined during a debate last week between president Bob Anderson and Forster Task Force member Keith Yates, is that students have a right to involve themselves in the choice of those who give them their education, and that teaching has to be made an integral aspect in the choice.

In a smiling, paternalistic phrase, the Forster report summed up the general feeling of the committee:

"Most members of the Task Force have known students, both graduate and undergraduate, whose intellectual capacity and judgement are such that one could easily accept their presence on a tenure committee."

But, would they want their sister to marry one?

SMC president John Kelly (right) asked the question: Do the colleges really mean anything?

Evans wants college changes

By Randy Robertson

U of T president John Evans personally urged sweeping changes to "revitalize the academic role" of the colleges at an Academic Affairs Committee meeting last week. The meeting was promptly dubbed "historic."

In a working paper presented to the committee, Evans urged that a university department be created for each college subject presently taught on the campus and that certain present university subjects, "the popular social sciences courses (and) possibly biological science and psychology" be included within the scope of college planning.

College subjects are presently taught in each college by the separate college departments of Classics, English, Ethics, French, German, Near Eastern Studies, Philosophy (St. Mike's) and Religious Studies.

"University subjects" are those which are taught in university buildings to students of all colleges by members of a variety of departments: Anthropology, Astronomy, Botany, Chemistry, Computer Science, East Asian Studies, Fine Art, Geography, Geology, History, Islamic Studies, Italian, Hispanic Studies, Mathematics, Philosophy, Physics, Political Economy, Psychology, Sanskrit and Indian Studies, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Sociology, Zoology.

The staff of the university department is to consist of all members of the college departments who will continue to hold their college appointments as well, Evans said.

The proposed responsibilities of the university department are:

- co-ordinating the matching of needs for instruction at all levels, including graduate, undergraduate, professional and part-time, with the personnel available.
 - control of appointments for the preservation of standards of appointment, promotion and tenure and for determining the priority of subject areas for replacements or new appointments
 - preparation of the departmental budget for the entire range of academic programs for submission to the Dean of Arts and Sciences.
- A chairman is to be appointed for each department according to the often-criticized Haist rules, irrespective of college affiliation, Evans proposed.
- Each college is to appoint an educational director and a program committee including representatives of all departments from which there are cross-appointments in the college. The program committee's recommendations have to be approved by the Faculty of Arts and Sciences.

Student governor Gord Barnes asked who would determine who was to be cross-appointed, the university department or the college program committee.

Evans said that "this would be negotiable" between the two.

The intention of the changes is to create as a university resource a personnel collective from which any college may draw staff, through cross-appointment, in accordance with the program emphasis or particular teaching approach it wishes to develop, the president explained.

Evans said that the changes will help insure college diversity since by broadening the discipline areas available to the colleges they encourage innovation and experimentation.

Evans also sounded another note of a continuing theme. The proposals will lead, he said, to "minimum duplication and maximization of resources."

These proposals will also make it possible for humanities and social sciences students to spend more time in their undergraduate years in their colleges — if they want to.

"These proposals will only provide the opportunity — if the student wants this relationship with his college he will be able to have it but he will not have to have it — they are not intended to place any restrictions on the student."

St. Mike's President J M Kelly noted that the proposals are an attempt to orient the colleges around the students' interests. "And this issue has been of concern to college presidents for years — do the colleges really mean anything to the students?"

Evans said that the first thing he asks every student he meets on the campus is why he chose the particular college he did, whatever that college is.

"Rarely was the college chosen for academic reasons: my brother went to Vic so I went to St. Mike's."

Faculty of Arts and Science Dean Bob Green claimed that the meeting was not an ordinary one.

"I am convinced that this is an historic meeting," Green said, and silence fell.

"This is an historic meeting, because though nothing has been presented for our approval action has been taken."

Green noted that the working paper embodied the recommendations of a number of committees over the past fifteen years.

"There is nothing new in the document before us; what is new is action."

"I see no alternative to the document before us," Green said.

"It is much touted all over North America that this university has the collegiate system and that this difference has done a lot to diminish for all concerned the various aspects of the 'multi-university'."

"But we are at the end of one definition of the college and we must redefine the concept."

The proposals mean that Innis will have to go conservative, Innis principal Peter Russell said. Innis will have to do more for students who, wanting to take a general course, have not been able to take those classes at the college.

Innis may not be able to sponsor as many innovative or experimental courses as it has in the past, but Russell expressed his willingness to accept this state of affairs.

"I was asked to be a principle of a college and I thought a college was an academic community. Innis at the present time is not an academic community."

He said that at the present time only one out of every five Innis students takes Innis courses.

"For four-fifths of our students Innis is just a place for tea, though it's beer now." These students benefit only from the college's extracurricular activities, he said.

Evans won plaudits for his personal initiative from the heads of the colleges invited to the meeting.

But Kelly, warned that the proposal would "meet with strong resistance from the four older colleges Ue, Vic, Trinity, and St. Mike's, as it will with the present larger university departments, such as English or French. Kelly said that these departments "these dukedoms, these kingdom, these feifdoms" will see the proposals as a covert attempt at "Balkanization."

Evans hopes to be able to assess what will be possible for the 1974-75 year once the college heads, the School of Graduate Students the various departments and the Faculty of Arts and Sciences have discussed the document.

This means that these bodies will have to discuss the document quickly.

New College principal Donald Ivey said that his college council had endorsed the document with enthusiasm, the day before the Academic Affairs committee meeting.

Any decisions for changes to be implemented next year will have to go before the university's budget committee.

Kelly said that the timetable is "too exigent...too demanding...especially in relation to budgetary decisions."

Whence comes the money ?

The proposals by University President John Evans will mean new financial arrangements with the university for the colleges.

The working paper presented at the Academic Affairs committee meeting suggests that the operating income (apart from private endowments) derived from fees and government grants might be determined on the basis of a two-part formula consisting of:

(a) Instructional costs related to the use of personnel from the college to meet the academic and administrative responsibilities of the university departments, and cross-appointed to the college, and;

(b) General operating costs related to the number of students registered in the college.

This arrangement, the paper says, recognizes the responsibility of the university for staff who have been approved by the central appointment mechanism, and also recognizes the costs related more directly to students in areas such as academic and non-academic support services and individual counselling where the colleges will have broader responsibilities.

The university departments in both "college" and "university" are to make adequate subjects are to make adequate provision, through the Faculty of Arts and Science's curriculum committees and budgetary mechanisms for the programs and cross-appointments.

The colleges are to provide office accommodation "and opportunities for informal contacts for its cross-cross-appointed staff members to the maximum extent possible."

Carrelling in Fort Book: forget it till January

By TIM GALLAGHER

For a graduate student seeking a carrel in the Roberts Library, "there's always January." That's what one library official said in explaining the shortage of carrels.

Only 288 of the projected 688 study cubicals have been completed in the library and they are to be allocated by the first of the year.

With more than 1,000 applications accepted by the library for carrels many graduate students are without one, library spokesmen said. Basically the library assigns the carrels on a priority system. PHD students and MA students doing their theses get top priority, the library has said. Also considered are professors on sabbatical and those "doing concentrated research." In addition, spokesmen said, carrels are assigned "to those doing a project on a short-term basis." Mrs. Jane Cooper, who is involved with assigning carrels, said: "There are six professors doing research and 16 on sabbatical who have carrels, but a large majority have been given to PHD students completing their theses."

Complaints by some graduate students that the professors are getting the carrels are dismissed by library officials. They pointed out 400 carrels are not completed on the tenth and twelfth floors. "That's our problem," they said.

The $42-million structure remains uncompleted in the upper floors because of a lack of funds. University officials have admitted that money is not available to complete the unfinished sections at this time.

Prior to the completion of the library, administration officials had predicted the library would have one of the largest collections of books of any university library in North America.

However, because so much money was spent on the actual structure, the collection ranks sixth and the carrels have gone uncompleted.

When asked about students using the unfinished carrels which do not have locks, library officials said "We have lockers for books. Those without a locked carrel have the use of lockers." Some people have carrels on a short-term basis for a month and others for the term. The officials maintained: "It doesn't mean you have to wait until next term to get one."

Everyone has to re-apply for the use of a carrel next term. Library officials claimed it would be on "a first come first serve basis" but within the framework of the priority system. Meanwhile, they said: "We have open carrels which we are assigning on a short-term basis." However, they failed to mention that these carrels are subject to squatters' rights.

Furthermore, the open carrels lack the convenience of a locked carrel with its desk, easy chair, and book shelf.

Some people have suggested that the Library take advantage of its excess space to earn some extra cash. One student, for instance, suggested sponsoring basketball tournaments in the stacks: Roberts officials, however, felt there would be trouble with seating arrangements and emphasized they had no intention of competing with the Houston Astrodome.

Carrel-stuffing may become a new campus sport because of shortage.

Fired math prof takes case to Evans

Stephen Salaff, the part-time math instructor whose contract has not been renewed, is going to carry his struggle on to university president John Evans next week.

Salaff is planning to appeal his case to the president, he says, while at the same time a petition in his support is being circulated among faculty members.

Last March, students occupied the offices of the mathematics department to protest the refusal of the department to re-hire Salaff and the denial of tenure to two other math professors, Michael Mather and David Spring.

The petition now being circulated among faculty on Salaff's behalf states that the signatories agree that the right to appeal a denial of contract is a "basic right of all faculty members."

Professors are allowed to appeal a denial of tenure to the university president, but current practice does not generally allow part-time instructors or lecturers such an appeal.

The recent Forster Task Force report on academic appointments suggests preserving this denial of appeal rights to instructors.

Salaff says he hopes his case can become a focal point for the issue of appeal of loss of a job for teaching staff not eligible for tenure.

Salaff attempted to appeal his case to Dean Bob Greene of the Faculty of Arts and Science last spring, but Salaff said the dean did not allow the appeal because the dean said there were no grounds.

Salaff also had criticism for the Faculty Association, which he said has given him no support. Salaff said the association does not allow non-tenured staff members in the association by setting a minimum salary requirement which no non-tenured faculty member can meet.

Strikers protest police actions

By BOB BETTSON

About 200 strikers and strike supporters demonstrated in front of Metro police headquarters Saturday to protest police violence on the picket line at the strikebound Artistic Woodwork plant in North York.

The strike is now entering its third month and violence on the picket line shows no sign of letting up with over 72 arrests to date. A succession of speakers denounced the police role in the strike charging that the police are acting as "strikebreakers."

During the demonstration the police lowered a boom mike over the demonstrators, capable of picking up individual conversations. They also had two photographers across the street with telephoto lenses taking pictures of the demonstrators.

Meanwhile inside the glass doors a plainclothes policeman was leafing through a book of pictures, trying to identify individual demonstrators.

Ontario Labor Minister Fern Gindon has refused to intervene in the strike until tensions on the picket line lessen. He criticized Toronto Aldermen Dan Heap, John Sewell and William Kilbourn for joining the picket line last week. "They confuse the issues more than they are helping," he said.

Numbers on the picket line reached 100 to 120 at the Densley Street Artistic Woodwork plant last week. They have been met with increasingly large contingents of Metro police who help the convoys of cars carrying strikebreakers in and smash through the picket line, up to 70 police at a time.

The Toronto and District Labor Council passed a resolution last week calling for a meeting with the police commission to deal with evidence of the "shameful" role of police in the strike.

The police commission previously refused to meet with Toronto City Council over charges of police brutality in the strike.

The Labor Council also called for city council to deny essential services such as water and hydro to the strikebound plant. They demanded the resignation of Police Chief Harold Adamson, Deputy Chief John Ackroyd and Police Commission Chairman C.O. Bick.

In other developments, the company has issued new criticisms of the intervention of city politicians in the strike and has also claimed that 94 of 116 workers at the plant have returned to work.

Canadian Textile and Chemical Union organizer Bob Davis denies this, saying that of the 80 people now working at the plant, only 30 were previously employed. These employees, he added, were never members of the union and didn't go on strike. "The other 50 are scabs," he said.

The union is now charging the company with bargaining in bad faith, and the case will be heard by the Ontario Labor Relations Board Wednesday morning.

The union and the company have agreed on a wage settlement but workers went on strike to oppose an arbitrary management rights clause that the company has since refused to bargain on.

This clause would allow arbitrary dismissal and provides no job security.

The next week in the strike is going to be crucial with increasing confrontation on the picket line likely. Negotiations broke down last week after resuming briefly the week before.

Court cases for many strikers and strike supporters are scheduled to begin later this month, but most will be heard in November. A defense fund has been established to pay the legal fees for those arrested.

Star UW story a 'fabrication'

By DICK BROWN

A York University student has accused the Toronto Star of "gross distortion" and "pure fabrication" in a story the newspaper ran which claimed he endorsed the United Way.

Ronald Rosenthal a political science student, is a hemophiliac who says in an open letter: "The only thing I've ever received from the United Way is frustration at not being able to convince people that nothing significant is being done for the disabled."

Rosenthal denies he told The Star he was "thankful" for the United Way's support of the Red Cross blood donor system, and he says the paper was not accurate in stating the medical facts about hemophilia.

"Under no conditions would I ever express that 'I'm thankful for the United Way and the Red Cross who process this blood,' as the Star reported.

"I would not make such a statement because the Red Cross had refused to increase its production of blood concentrates for hemophiliacs for many years.

Rosenthal said that the Red Cross has shortages of bloody every summer and that the shortages usually go away by fall. A particular kind of blood needed by hemophiliacs, he said is what is called blood concentrate.

"The authorities have set an arbitrary figure of 20 per cent of all whole blood collected which is set aside to convert to a number of concentrates, including that needed by hemophiliacs," Rosenthal said.

"It is well known medically that 30 per cent of the blood collected by the Red Cross is thrown out as outdated. There is no reason why this blood couldn't be fractionated down and saved indefinitely."

Rosenthal said the Star story alleging a hemophiliac could bleed to death from a small bruise perpetuates "this popular myth contrary to medical fact."

"Small cuts and bruises are not dangerous. If they were, I would have bled to death years ago from the puncture in my arm every four days for my transfusions," Rosenthal said.

Rosenthal said he consented to be interviewed by the Star because the newspaper told him it would be an interview dealing with the Hemophilia Society, of which Rosenthal is an executive member.

He was furious when the story came out in support of the United Way.

"One of the agencies supported by the United Way is the Sheltered Workshop," Rosenthal said. "There the chronically - unemployed handicapped is allowed to work for forty cents an hour - so they make only $5 in two weeks!"

"If you really want to help demand that the federal government include handicaps as a group which cannot be discriminated against under the Bill of Rights."

"I want a job, not security."

'Twit of the week'

Ivey clings to old ivory tower walls

Our Concise Oxford Dictionary defines the word twit very concisely — to wit — a person with a fault, etc. And at the risk of name-calling we'd like to crown New College principal Don Ivey with the distinction of "Twit of the Week." (Yes, it's the self-righteous Varsity again.)

However, we refuse to take Ivey or his comments personally — the man can't possibly be serious in saying some of the things he did recently. We think his real motive in trying to attract attention is to gain publicity so that he can be kicked upstairs to an administrative office. And what better way to catch Doctor John's eye than to appear regularly in The Varsity?

It's rather difficult to keep up with Ivey these days but we'll try to follow some of his outstanding deeds of this past week.

Last Monday good old Don launched himself into the public arena in a debate over the staffing question and student representation on committees. His opponent was boy wonder, Bob Anderson. Kind of like David going after the Jolly Green Giant, eh?

Ivey's comments were interesting — they had us laughing around the offices here, and we tape recorded some of his comments and ran a laugh track-applause contest. Ivey scored an almost perfect nine out of 10 on our audience participation meter so we decided to award him our first "Twit of the Week" award.

Some of the famous lines of Donald Ivey, T.W.I.T. (the wit-tiest in Toronto) are:

• "we don't know what constitutes good teaching."

• "I do not know of any staff members who do not take their teaching responsibilities seriously."

• "the staff are more intelligent...have a better perspective."

• "the university is an elitist institution. By nature I believe it has to be."

Now, intelligent conservatives

we at least understand, but Don Ivey.....?

Oh well, perhaps Ivey has met his Waterloo this time. After all, the student referendum last week did show that things are somewhat differently thought of by 6,000 other people in this university. But then, again, the university has to remain elitist so why bother considering students, eh Don?

Ivey should perhaps consider who this university is operating for — the students or faculty — and then maybe take his paternalistic thoughts in hand and head for the city's incinerator (although we do risk raising the pollution control level above normal). Maybe teachers don't know what constitutes good teaching, but some students on this campus appear to feel quite strongly on the issue — strongly enough in fact to know who they learn from and what good teaching involves.

And how is this student evaluation measured? Well, we admit it's an imperfect method (but what's a perfect method of measurement — a Don Forster tenure committee?) but it's better than some. However, Ivey feels that "the trouble with course unions is that students are too kind to their professors." (Is this the same man talking?) All right then, let's release the vast hordes loose with paper and pen to rate their teachers. Don't worry, Don, we're sure you'll be overrated.

The next bold publicity venture Ivey struck out on was to actually have a letter published in the campus news journal — no, not the Bulletin, but the students' very own voice, The Varsity. We wrote a cute little article about Ivey complaining about the furniture that was being ripped off from before his very eyes. Ivey responded with a letter.

He wrote that "the current rush of thefts and other anti-social acts makes me wish that I could personally patrol the college 24 hours a day but his is not feasible." Well, we think the administration should make him an offer he can't refuse — college principalships are sort of passe anyway. However, when you put Police Poodle Ivey (apologies to the CPC-ML) on patrol please have him curbed and on a long chain.

Ivey also attacked The Varsity last week, thereby knowingly gaining a chance for some publicity (this editorial of course). Now that his close to home, Ivey said that The Varsity is a totally biased view of the situation through its editorial board. Masked Marauder Don Ivey isn't doing too badly himself, if he only took off those blinkers. Sure The Varsity is biased. We readily admit it. We are definitely pro student (believe it or not). But without getting into the topic of our editorial policy it's enough to say that Ivey isn't exactly "objective" himself. If Ivey doesn't have a bias than neither does Curtis E. Lemay or George Wallace. However, Don we prefer our bias to yours, of course. We like to think there is some truth around these days — although that's getting harder to find too. (If you pull back the academic curtain, we think maybe you'll see something more than books out there. There are a few people too.)

Finally a piece of resistance. Joy of joys, Don Ivey also sits on the men's athletic directorate as one of the seven faculty members (who are all very fine athletes, of course). A couple of weeks ago Ivey denounced The Varsity again in the Directorate's minutes of September 25th (copies are available from room 106 of the athletic wing). In the minutes referring to "Business Arising from the Minutes" Ivey "said that he wished to raise a question off to the minutes regarding an article in the September 26th, 1973 issue of The Varsity newspaper whereby it was that there was an attempt to bar the Student's Administrative Council's interim representative from the meeting until after the vote for president had taken place." He stated in reading the minutes as circulated that they presented an accurate record of the meeting and that The Varsity statement was wrong and he felt The Varsity showed "inaccuracies, half-truths and non-truths."

Well Don, let's state the facts, ok?

The Students' Administrative Council's interim representative was prevented from entering the meeting room by Phyllis Lea. To be more precise the SAC interim rep presented Lea with a letter to the effect that he would be representing the SAC as a legitimate rep. Lea then said that she would have to see whether the chairman would accept it. All other appointees were inside the room with the door closed, so how could Ivey possibly know that we were inaccurate — he wasn't even there. ESP, probably.

But we were there to report on the meeting and, as we're sure you are aware, Don, we were witness to the events, so please don't try any half-truths. The minutes are just as illegitimate as the Directorate you sit on.

Continuing with Ivey's comments from the minutes: "It has also been stated in The Varsity that the raising of the athletic fee from $15 to $20 in 1972-73 was approved without student participation, this is also not true because students were involved in approving the increase at the Athletic Directorate meeting relating to the budget."

If you call the four intercollegiate athletes plus the one intramural rep and college rep student representation, you're sadly mistaken. Since when do intercollegiate reps comprise the majority of athletes on this campus? But then Don, you believe in elitism don't you? The point we were attempting to make was that students at other universities were asked in referendums to approve a fee increase, it didn't go on in star-chamber-like proceedings behind closed doors. Remember Don the Directorate meetings were opened up last spring, while the fee increase happened two years ago. A nice show of openness by you people over there. What do you have to hide anyway, since you're so sure that you are in the right?

About this time the minutes show that old Varsity friend and Directorate chairman George Wodehouse jumped into the act. It was recorded in the minutes that Wodehouse "asked the members if they wished to repudiate the article in The Varsity by voting on the acceptance of the minutes as circulated. Congratulations, George, you've railroaded yet another meeting. The rules of order — virtually any meeting's rules of order — would indicate that no substantive comment should be made on the proposal of any motion, but on the motion itself only. In this case the motion might say "moved to accept the minutes as awarded" and them comment could be made. So Ivey's remarks were out of order and chairman Wodehouse not only let him go on, but also joined in with him.

Ivey and Wodehouse should at least learn their own rules if they want to play games with such important and "duly constituted" bodies as the Athletic Directorate. No wonder those people are having so much trouble in Hart House; they don't know their own rules, let alone the administration's. Oh well, as George Wodehouse might say in his folksy manner, "You can't teach an old dog new tricks."

Well, Don, you've had quite an interesting week. But you did fail a couple of tests. One, you inaccurately reported what really happened in the incident with the SAC interim rep outside the Directorate meeting, and two, you don't know the proper procedure for discussion in a meeting. Oh yes, one other thing...the letter you write to us had a spelling error in it but we corrected it. We don't mind — we try not to discriminate; we like to treat the teaching faculty as equals. Even the twits.

Prof praises Varsity reporting

Let me congratulate you and your staff for your continuing coverage of the debate concerning the composition of tenure committees in this university (and of related matters, esp. the recent dismissals of many untenured faculty colleagues.) This issue, I believe, is extremely important for the future of the university; without the Varsity reports it would be extremely difficult to keep abreast of recent developments in the debate (eg. "Tenure depends heavily on research" Varsity Oct. 17, p. 1.) And even though the crucial referendum is now over, because this issue should continue to concern us all, I am submitting these few thoughts on several important facets of the debate.

First of all, I am amazed to see that Principal Ivey, as reported in your story, actually believes the university to comprise an "intellectual elite." This view is probably shared by many university people. I believe that it is not only mistaken but dangerously arrogant. If we could assume that university people were an intellectual elite, that belief would be the strongest possible argument for admitting students to membership in tenure committees; intelligence is no respecter of age or maturity; and whether or not university people represent an intellectual elite in society, we can assume intelligence per se to be rather evenly distributed throughout the university population. What Principal Ivey should have said (unfortunately, it is closer to the truth) is that the university, and especially the university faculty, is an academic elite — that is, a corps of rather highly trained intellectual technicians, hierarchically arranged with the more highly trained and/or experienced at the top. Like all such technically based hierarchically arranged — hierarchically arranged with the more highly trained and

Like all such technically based hierarchies, university teachers by and large attempt to concentrate power within their organization and maintain it there. This may or may not be the sort of university which you or I desire; for heaven's sake, let us not pretend that the intellect has anything to do with this system. Surely the most which can be expected of academics in the contemporary university is a certain level of academic competence (and probably often not even that.) Fortunately for us all some truly gifted, intellectually creative people somehow seem to survive under these conditions; we all know who these colleagues are; perhaps their creativity will be sufficient to redeem us all — but let us not assume it. And let us have no more of this talk of universities and university teachers as an intellectual elite. Any child knows that it is not so!

This brings me to my second point. Intellectual creativity — to say nothing of genius — is very difficult to quantify and to assess. Academic competence is less so; all university teachers will, I think, grudgingly admit that current practice assumes a close correlation between a teacher's academic competence and the number of his or her publications. This practice may or may not allow a fair assessment of academic competence rather narrowly defined — it is certainly no measure of intellectual creativity, much less of teaching ability. Since teaching has never been a significant interest of the academic hierarchy, it stands to reason that only the student is equipped to judge it at first hand. Individual students, through lack of maturity, interest or ability, may individually make bad judgements; for that matter who teaches our faculty any assessment skills? Surely students could not be any less competent at judging teachers than teachers are at judging students, by and large.

Let us admit that teaching is a matter of very little importance to many university faculty. This is a strange situation in a university which is dependent on students and on the public purse for its very existence.

It is time for me to conclude these overlong remarks. The question remains to be settled and will continue to haunt the university until it is.

Pollution Probe will supply land deal info

By ROBIN THOMPSON

Pollution Probe is getting into a different kind of pollution, not the smoke-stack and dirty river type, but urban renewal pollution.

Probe is now subscribing to a $2,000-per-year real estate survey which catalogues land transactions by the property and development industry. The purpose: to make this information available to community groups who might be subject to land assembly by development companies.

Marilyn Cox, urban project coordinator for Pollution Probe, said their studies in Toronto's east end have uncovered one speculator who has made a profit of more than $250,000 on property transactions in Wards 8 and 9.

The high cost of subscribing to the Teela Market Survey Reports led Probe to go to the city's Urban Renewal, Fire and Legislation (URFL) committee last week to ask the city to foot the bill of the study.

The URFL committee, however, sent a different recommendation to the city's executive committee which is passing it on to city council next Wednesday for approval.

The URFL committee recommended that the city provide funds in the 1974 budget for a 10-year study of property transactions in the city to be undertaken by the city's planning board—for planning board purposes.

According to Cox, it all started with the Probe's investigation of private companies which collect information on property transactions and sell it for high fees to real estate people — who in turn use it to find out what's happening on the market and to establish their own prices.

This is where the land speculator fits in, Cox explained, adding that gross speculation in land and houses produces nothing but inflated prices.

No one in the city benefits with the exception of the speculator. The market for houses is very limited, making it so that the speculator cannot lose, she said.

The speculator does little to improve the house he buys, she explained, but does a lot in contributing towards the rising cost of housing. This is a major factor in the increasing costs of houses in Toronto, as people find they just cannot afford to finance buying a house.

Probe has had a subscription to Teela now for a year and they receive a copy every two weeks.

The Teela report gives information about current activity on real estate market. This is information which used to be only available to real estate companies and to the Provincial Assessment Department.

It records real estate transactions, and, for example, if there are a large number of sales in one particular neighborhood, then there is evidence of instability.

The Teela cards provide them with the name of the purchaser, the previous selling price, as well as the current sale price of the property—an easy indication of excessive inflation, Cox said.

The Teela Market Survey Report is a private company whose clients are primarily real estate agents. All its information is for public use; however it has proved inconvenient for an individual to obtain it, Cox said.

Probe's urban project has made the information available to representatives of community groups — some who are contributing to costs of the subscription to Teela.

Due to a rapid increase in the number of sales in Toronto, the cost for subscription is a lot more than the original estimation and more than they can raise through donations from community groups, Cox said.

The cost of the subscription to Probe runs closely to $2,000 a year and the costs for the file cards are approximately 8¢ per card.

The information is used by these groups for a variety of reasons, Cox explained. The Annex, for example, used it to spot land assemblies in their area and also to note property bought by absentee landlords to ensure the houses are kept up to standard.

In Ward 8 the information is used for cooperative housing and to estimate their costs in purchasing.

The East End Escarpment Association has undertaken an inventory of property in their area. Cox says that they want to use the information to prove that the area is stable and to support an approach for downzoning before the Ontario Municipal Board.

Cox suggested that the city should collect and file information, and that the city make the data collected available to community associations.

A large number of associations have expressed desire to get and use real estate data.

Cox goes on to say that neighborhoods have become a commodity on the market. If people value their neighborhood, then they will ensure the residents have access to information which affects them, Cox said.

This suggestion got many supporting letters and it was then taken to the Committee for Urban Renewal and in turn to the Executive Committee.

People approved of this proposition for various reasons, according to Cox.

First of all many working people who aren't free during the day can't make use of the public information in the city's Registry Office, she said.

"Also rising cost of housing is of great concern to us," Cox said. Supporters feel that a city service such as that would be the first step towards thorough public understanding of forces involved in rising housing costs and lack of houses.

Ratepayers and community groups undertaking studies of their areas would also benefit, said Cox.

Ward 9 approved of the proposition, as it is involved in a Community Housing Co-operation and cannot afford Teela services that other land purchasers in the area available to them.

Cox said that they are therefore in the power of the realtor. Also if they had all the data, they would be able to make a more intelligent purchase.

Probe has received letters opposing this project. Some writers see it as a waste as the taxpayers money. The writers said that the registry office at city hall and assessment records are already available to the public. Some also see it as an invasion of privacy, and that result would be "public consumption" and discussion of sale on purchase of properties.

Others see it as invaluable information and would be used as part of a program for the free distribution of public information to members of committees who are not represented by any special organizations.

Those were some of the arguments that confronted probe's proposition at the URFL committee meeting last week.

Cox continued her battle for the city to collect information and make it public for community associations as well as residents. Cox also maintains that the city has no way of knowing what's going on even though it's their business.

Cox said she finds it hard to understand especially when the development industry knows everything while the city remains ignorant.

WASHINGTON - (Special) - A Colorado college psychology instructor, refused a second-year contract allegedly in retaliation for presenting a panel on lesbianism to one of her classes of "Psychology of Women," is has filed suit in Denver for reinstatement, back salary and $100,000 in damages.

Susan Brown is suing Ames College in Greeley, contending that she was denied her "procedural due process rights in that she was never provided written reasons for her nonrenewal nor a fair hearing concerning nonrenewal of her contract."

Two other Colorado teachers are filing non-renewal suits today in U.S. District Court in Denver. They are Florence Coen, a teacher at Lincoln Elementary School, Boulder Valley School District; and Donald Weathers, a teacher and basketball coach at West Grade School, West Yuma County School District. Both are seeking reinstatement, back salary and $200,000 in damages.

In the Brown suit against members of the College Council of Ames College and Ed Beatty, college president, Brown's brief states that the panel discussion of three members of the Denver Lesbian Center was relevant to the subject matter of her course and that she had advance approval by her administrative supervisors to have the discussion.

Quebec Liberals too busy seducing corporations to bother about language

adapted from QUEBEC-PRESSE

Although the language question was one of Bourassa's rallying points in the Liberal party's platform during the last election campaign, it's a completely different story this year. Language questions are met only with indifference from the politicians. They prefer to avoid the subject, but if they sometimes have to speak on it they're very much restricted by their parties' plans for a campaign strategy.

Evidently the language issue is less of a burning issue than it was some years ago: under Bourassa there was no Bill 63 problem, no 'McGill français' demonstration, and no incident comparable to that of the Aime-Renaud school. At no time during the last three years have Quebecois gone into the streets to defend their language.

After three and one half years in power Bourassa hasn't yet brought out a policy or even a thought-provoking speech on the language question. The government is content to reaffirm from time to time its willingness to strengthen the place of the French language... but it will do so only by infringing in the least possible way on the privileges already acquired by Anglophones.

Before revealing the Liberals' linguistic policy, Bourassa wanted to know the results of the Gendron commission. But for several months now the commission hasn't held back any secrets from anyone, and yet we still wait for this first-rate political policy that's been promised so many times.

And worse still, the Liberal party's program on language policy unveiled last week only offers us a warmed-over version of the same stale line. It reformulates the wishes already expressed in the 1970 campaign: the party even dreams of transforming the 'Language Office' into a state-managed department for the French language which would protect French in Quebec. It intends to follow up the 'refrenchification' of businesses, while accelerating its program of making French the working language, and finally, it favors the integration of future immigrants through a plan of languages' development.

Such are the grand outlines of the language situation since the Liberals came to power. Guy Bouthillier, a political science professor at the Université de Montréal and author of the book "Le choc des langues", traces for us here the displeasing balance sheet of the Bourassa cabinet's accomplishments and the implications of the lack of a government language policy.

According to Bouthillier, the language question involves three choices. The government must, above all, legislate on a matter which deals with the state so directly, that is, language, to ensure that it's spoken. In the second place it must regulate language in the schools, a relatively simple matter since the state already has the controlling hand on education. And finally it must move towards the question of a working language, a more thorny question because the government has a less direct stake.

Yet this supposes constraints and the agreement of business managers. What has Bourassa done? His slogan during the last election centred for the most part on "French as the working language" question, which permitted him to avoid the other two facets of the problem.

Nevertheless the Bourassa government is pre-occupied with the "language of work" issue without any great conviction. To make French the official language means to defy control by the St. James St. financiers. And rest assured, there's no question about it; Bourassa has a kind of economic fixation; outside of financial questions he fails to see anything. He then attempts to convince people that it's not very important anyway, since it's not a question of a large amount of money.

Bourassa promised three times to make French the working language - October 1969, June 1970, and October 1973

"French must become the working language of Quebec. Everyone realizes the obvious situation of the language, above all in the Montreal area. It's unthinkable that in Quebec, whose population contains a majority of French-speaking people, it is all too often impossible to use French as the working language."

This isn't a member of the opposition speaking but the prime minister of Quebec, Robert Bourassa, who made a speech to this effect to the National Assembly after the election of his government on June 9, 1970. There was no doubt, no ambiguity in Bourassa's declarations: business circles would have to accept the fact that the goal of the government would be to make French the working language. This was one of Bourassa's priorities: "We could show a wealth of information (data) to demonstrate the urgent nature of making French the working language", he said in October 1969. "In three or four years it will probably be too late. The pressure of the workers will not bring this about all of a sudden in 1975 or 1976. We must go through with it now."

It's now three and a half years later and Bourassa hasn't resolved the language question as he had promised to do before launching new elections. The other promise to make French the working language rests on the shelf, gathering more dust than ever.

Meanwhile, at General M

How many remember the dedication by Bourassa's meeting with the managers of the Motors who were refusing the principle of French as a language, at the time of a collective agreement. "Not be treated as a second-class language because he said Useless words, since since July 1970, he affirmed that would be "perhaps led to companies who put on the pressure of trying to make the working language."

But Bourassa wasn't the go around in circles, to force as a working language" he said the two slogans (along with concerning 100,000 jobs) him to win the election. labor, Jean Cournoyeur, in an interview that it's necessary steps toward that policy, that it wasn't a question of French as the only language.

"I am convinced that unilingualism is not the Minister of Cultural Affairs, Cloutier, on March 9, 1971, homeland of a minority of Anglophones which includes Canadians of English or French while immigrants have acquired the predominant culture of the continent. It is to go against the rights of past assurances to Anglophones Quebec for more than a half century."

We can also add the name of Jerome Choquette who said "firmly persuaded" that "persons, anxious for the future of Canada moderate and under the situation, would not be able to find union solutions, which quick the rights of a minority of 20 per cent."

Or even the comments of Jean-Paul Beaudry who affirmed that "unilingualism isn't a practical or desirable thing in Montreal." All these declarations, let's remember, were made when Bourassa was protesting furiously against the Bertrand government for its adoption of a law imposing French as the working language.

The Anglophone minority

How can we explain this about-face?
Nothing is more simple: the Anglophone

America: "The problem of language" stated the executives to the large companies, "is actually the most serious obstacle to the industrial expansion in Quebec."

Bourassa explained these prolonged silences on the language question by the commitment his government had made all straighten out Quebec's economic difficulties.

Bourassa throws out a bone

To silence his critics Bourassa threw out a sop: he gave more emphasis to the Office while the Francophones over-utilize English. The Anglophones also give in much less than Francophones to linguistic pressure, and, moreover the report confirms that the majority of Anglophones (67 per cent in Montreal, and 49 per cent throughout the province) are in an economic situation which permits them to avoid using French at work.

These alarming conclusions didn't disturb the Liberal government, which seeks refuge behind the Gendron report as an excuse for its own impotence. The prime minister uses the voluminous report when it serves his interests, regulating to oblivion the recommendations which don't suit his purposes. Bouthillier concludes that "all this tends to demonstrate that the Gendron commission has a tedious value, that it only serves to calm people down and buy time."

Propping himself up on the Gendron report's recommendations, Bourassa refuses to open the debate on Bill 63.
Evidently this is all right, for at least the prime minister is logical with himself; after all, didn't the government bring in Bill 631?

According to Bouthillier, the Gendron report could have provided the opportunity to sketch out a new political statement.
"An intelligent government which wants to make something out of the language matter but knows that it must be careful of national public opinion and extra national affairs could have used the Gendron commission to make a project of reform. Instead the government gives the impression that since it's done nothing for three years that it had no thoughts on the language question. It confirms in public opinion the faulty analysis that the government can do nothing, that it is linked by principles, pressure, and interests. A somber government advocates the most pure liberalism:
incite, yeas; invite, consult, but don't impose. They were saying the same thing in economic matters 100 years ago," Bouthillier added.

A large scale evasion

What can we conclude from this large scale evasion by Bourassa? In January, 1973, a study established that without a doubt more than 70 per cent of the people established situated in head offices in Montreal are Anglophones and that the working language is English. A unilingual Anglophone is as well-paid as a bilingual Francophone; the highest paid positions are, for certain, occupied by Anglophones.

A study done for the Gendron commission established that one Francophone for every two Anglophones earns 110,000 and less; one for every four earns from $15,000 to $22,000; and finally, one out of six is going to get a salary more than $22,000.
Almost 80 per cent of the personnel of head offices is recruited in Quebec, but this personnel is chosen for the large majority from the Anglophones, except for the personnel which hold the lower salaries.

According to Bouthillier, nothing will result from a governmental policy which treats French as a working language in such a manner. "Certain firms decided to offer token gestures but they were a step ahead of the government: they realized that if they went against the government's suggested policy that no one will take action. And moreover these enterprises were ones at the bottom of the scale where French was spoken - in factories and not in administration.

No, the government didn't force them to speak French. Although it perhaps made some discrete allusions. But as you know, the government has a terrible habit of concentrating on economic matters; and when you are luring firms into the province, you don't impose policy...you suggest it!

minority reacted, showing the government its power. Suffice to say that the president of Montreal Trust, Frank J. Case, declared in 1971 that the language policy for Quebec could compel some firms to transfer their head offices out of Quebec, thereby depriving the "future young people of Quebec of the opportunity to rise to positions of authority." This caused Bourassa to proceed with kid gloves.

Another weathervane came from the president of the Bank of Montreal, J. A. Arnold Hart, a spokesman for one of the most important financial groups in Canada;
Bourassa also weighed his comments. Mr.
Hart said that "language, more than bombs, frightens off Quebec investors." Hart even went so far as to recommend to the government that it expend a large amount of energy teaching English to the Francophones before "helping the workers to realize their ambitions and attain the highest positions."

And it's true that the Bourassa government, in the framework of its new five year plan, advocated the creation of a school system offering a teaching program on a completely bilingual basis.
Quebecois would therefore arrive at the perfect mastery of both French and English.

But the straw that broke the camel's back was the Fantus report, which attempted to circumvent the image that Quebec presents in the industrial milieu of North of the French Language, created in 1961 and charged with preparing abridged dictionaries for business firms and working with the many managers of firms toward the goal of Frenchifying them. But the action of the office was timid without even a strong voice.

There was also an agreement concluded between the federal government and that of Quebec, according to Minister of Cultural Affairs Cloutier, that would permit
Quebec to play its role to the fullest extent at the heart of the Francophone Agency.
But the agreement explicitly stated that Quebec is not a member with the "State status of the Agency. It possesses the characteristics of a participating state and isn't represented in the heart of the Agency, but only at the interior of the Canadian delegation, to which it is indissolubly linked. It isn't free to vote as it intends to and depends on the good wishes of Ottawa.

The Gendron report: a device set up to waste time

The Gendron report doesn't advocate French unilingualism for Quebec. It favors, however, a politics emphasizing the priority of French. This important document carries the roof that French is not useful to Francophones in the metropolitan region.
And even for francophones French must often give way to English. There is a clear under-utilization of French by Anglophones

Residents issue demands before joining Innis co-op

By BOB BETTSON

Residents of a number of university-owned houses on Sussex Avenue slated for renovation as part of the proposed Innis Community Corporation decided Wednesday to make four "non-negotiable" demands before joining the co-op.

Innis is now in the process of completing a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loan to renovate the houses, one of which is the future site of the over-two day-care centre now illegally occupying the meteorological building on Devonshire Place.

The plan is intended by Innis to become part of the existing community and not to dislocate residents who now live there. But the tenants are demanding more assurances.

The demands now include provisions for all existing residents to remain if they choose to, complete access to renovation plans, a co-operative decision on future use of the houses and a cash grant from U of T to the co-op to make immediate repairs.

The group also wants an in-depth discussion of the estimates for the planned renovations. Spokesman Klaus Rohrich charged that the estimated cost of more than $250,000, in the proposal from Innis to the tenants, is "padded," pointing to the high cost of appliances as an example.

He also criticized the proposed professional cleaning charges for the three student-occupied houses in the plan. Rohrich noted that the proposed rent for the 34 students would be $89 a month which would mean almost $1,000 income a month for each house.

The main objection the residents are making is the lack of consultation involved in the planning of the new development. This contrasts with statements by U of T president John Evans promising co-operation and consultation with the community in any future developments.

The Innis Co-op has been heralded by the college's students and administration as an example of how the university and the community can co-operate together.

Behind the present strained relations lie years of complaints about the management of the houses. The present manager is Crown Trust and some are rented to middlemen who live rent-free while reaping large profits from students tenants.

The university and Crown Trust have been letting the houses run down for the last four years in anticipation of the Innis development.

Rohrich said he and other residents could document many instances of Crown Trust mismanagement. He revealed that his own basement was flooded for a year before it was finally repaired.

He charged that the university has been "deliberately neglecting" repairs to the houses.

He said 180 repairs were ordered by city building inspectors on five of the houses. The university has ignored outstanding city work orders for the estimated $40,000 in repairs pending the renovations.

Rohrich said he had sent the work orders to alderman Dan Heap who brought it up at the last meeting of the U of T - City Liaison Committee. They just referred it elsewhere.

Meanwhile in Ottawa last week, Tory MP and confirmed abolitionist Peter Reilly, during the debate on capital punishment, demanded the death penalty for slum landlords.

"To the guillotine with governments that create unemployment! Slum landlords to the gallows!" he shouted to the applause from both sides of the house.

Still time to get run over

By DICK BROWN

While students play dodge-car on Queen's Park Crescent in the hope of being able to safely cross the west side of the highway, municipal officials are slowly winding their way through the red tape of three levels of government to try to get a traffic light at Hoskin Avenue.

So far Toronto City Council has approved the idea, but it must also be approved by the Metropolitan level of government and then by the provincial Minister of Transportation.

Ward 6 Alderman William Archer, has asked the Transportation Committee of Metro Council to look at the proposal on October 29 or if that is not possible to hear the matter on November 12.

His request also includes a request that the meeting date be set aside for deputations, so that students and other concerned persons could present their views.

Once past the Metro committee, the traffic light proposal then must be passed by the full Metro Council.

With any kind of luck the whole approval process just might be done by Christmas.

Then comes the next problem: figuring out which level of government is going to install the light and after that getting it done. There seem to be no predictions on when that might occur.

Toronto sweeps OUAA track championships

By BRAD MORLEY

U of T dominated the OUAA track and field championships, winning 17 medals and amassing 183 points. Host school Queen's came second with 125 and Western was third with 78.

Dave Jarvis annexed 50 of the Gaels' points and was named top athlete at the meet. For Toronto, Gerry Feeney turned in a good performance, including a convincing win in the 400 metres with a time of 48.6. Another notable performance came from Mike McVarish who jumped 45'7" in the triple jump for second place.

Bruce Simpson continued his world class performances with a height of 17'0" in the pole vault under poor conditions. Joey Sax surprised the field by winning the 1500 metres with a final lap of 59 seconds, after earlier taking first in the 3000 metre steeple chase.

The jumpers and vaulters finished first and second in all their events, a difficult feat to beat.

Mike Dyon raced at Ottawa on Saturday in the Eastern Canadian Juvenile Cross-Country Championships. He finished first, well ahead of the field, and earned a berth on the Ontario team travelling to Victoria for the national title.

The women's team only sent five members to Queen's but they acquitted themselves well. All results from the meet were not available, but Waterloo won with 51 points, closely followed by York with 50. Toronto was either third or fourth with 23.

U of T research spans the globe

If you've never heard of Townner, North Dakota, don't worry. Only a select handful of university types have even the vaguest idea why it's worth worrying about.

Buried in the bowels of Middle America (McHenry County to be exact), Townner, N.D. is the home of a family full of butterfly freaks doing research for U of T.

Splashed across the front page of the Mouse River Farmers' Press is the story of the Lyle Jorgenson family tagging monarch butterflies so university researchers could trace migratory patterns.

It must have been the biggest story since Arlo Guthrie dumped the garbage over the cliff on Thanksgiving Day.

In glowing detail, the unnamed reporter tells how the Jorgenson family got the whole community involved including: farmers Adam Kuhn and Virgil Hamans, Grade 5 teacher Adah Burvill, and ever a butterfly fanatic from Castro Valley, California, Paul Cherubini

The interactive programming language APL is both powerful and easy to use. Many computer operations can be accomplished with simplicity. APL is especially adept at manipulating data and printing out results with a minimum of fuss.

The course consists of six lectures to be held Wednesdays and Thursdays, 4:00 - 5:30 p.m. beginning October 24 at the Galbraith Building, 35 St. George Street, Room 248.

To register, please call 928-3787.

Blues beat Brock 6-0

By PETER HILLIER

From the outset of yesterday's Blues soccer game with Brock the home team dominated with lethargic ease. After waiting three quarters-of-an-hour for the Saint Catherine's team to arrive the Toronto squad immediately applied pressure on a weak ten-man opposition.

The defensive combination of Slimmon, Crewe and Dubsky were able to pass the ball in relays across the field with relative calm as Brock's hustling was nullified by the Blues superior ball control. Dangerous plays were built up from defence using wingers Caramancio and Savarino.

After only ten minutes one such play resulted in a fine goal: Dubsky fed Caramancio on the left wing and he relayed the ball to Elvy Zanette at the near post. The burly centreman then crashed a powerful left foot shot high on the near side from ten yards out.

Two minutes later the other centre forward, Vince Ierullo picked up a bouncing ball and fired a low shot into the right corner while moving left across the goal fifteen yards out. If it was not for the Blues general lethargy after an easy start the score would have been much higher at half time. As it was Carman Marcantonio was the only other scorer converting a header from Burns at a sharp angle ten minutes before the break.

Blues started the second half with their usual indecisive play, but the Brock team was not willing or able to even carry the ball close to Toronto scraped out a narrow win in the OUAA sailing title with the last regatta of the season. Final standings from the six meets were: 1. Toronto, 37; 2. Queen's, 36; 3. RMC, 35; 4. Trent, 29.

Two weekends ago Toronto hosted and won the Flippersevent with a team of Ian Brown, Kathleen Muir, Dave Bussin, and Colin Andrew. Rochester was second, followed by Guelph, RMC, Queen's, and Trent, in order.

Trent hosted the crucial regatta this weekend and the Blues came through in the clutch to win the Albacores and the title with Brown, Joanna the Kid, Scott Gibson and Ron Francis. RMC was second, followed by Queen's and Trent.

RMC and Queen's will get another crack at Toronto in the Canadian championships the home team's penalty area. Judd had a boring afternoon as Brock had no shots on net all game.

Seven minutes after the interval Peter Hillier scored his first goal of two season's play when he stole the ball from a Brock player and carried the ball to the edge of the penalty area at speed. A hard right-foot shot, released on the run, found its mark just below the bar to the left of the goaltender.

Twenty-five minutes later Marcantonio scored his second as a hard centre from Ierullo was mishandled by the goalie on the line with the Blues forward there to just bustle the ball into the net. The scoring was completed by Tim Burns who scored on a penalty shot less than minutes from full time.

Blues played with a lack of aggression against an inferior opposition, but a more determined attitude may be required for the tough Western Mustangs confrontation in London on Thursday.

Doret ties season TD record with 12

Blues repay loss to Gaels with 48-6 sweep

By JEAN BUBBA and PAUL CARSON

The on-again, off-again playoff hopes of the football Blues are decidedly on-again following Saturday's decisive 48-6 demolition of Queen's Golden Gaels before a well-lubricated homecoming crowd of about 10,000 at the Stadium.

With the victory Blues climbed into second place in the OUAA eastern division and simultaneously eliminated Queen's from the playoff picture.

Varsity now has a 4-3 record but must defeat first-place Ottawa Gee-Gees in their final game. Oct. 27 at the Stadium and then hope that Carleton can upset Ottawa the next weekend as Blues sit on the sidelines and watch. It's not much to go on, but at least Varsity does have a mathematical chance and Carleton did lose by only two points to Ottawa in their first meeting three weeks ago.

Saturday's effort saw Blues dig deep for their missing pride and come up with a solid display of almost perfect football: aggressive, gambling, tough without being dirty, and admittedly at times somewhat lucky.

It's becoming repetitive to single out Cor Doret for special mention week after week but once again it must be done simply because it is deserved. The COE student now in his fifth and final year of Carleton football scored three second-half touchdowns to tie the OUAA record for season touchdowns with twelve; Doret has one game to break the mark he shares with Queen's half-backs Gord McLellan and Brian Warrender (1971 season).

In addition to his three touchdowns, Doret rushed for 123 yards on 18 carries and caught eight passes for an additional 90 yards.

However, what Blues did to Gaels was a solid team performance and the entire squad deserves the accolades as a unit.

Offensively, Varsity amassed an incredible 691 net yards with 341 from 48 running plays and another 350 from passing as quarterbacks Wayne Dunkley and Al Brencley completed 25 of 36 attempts.

The Varsity - Brian Pei

Cor Doret leaves hordes of Queen's animals behind on the way to tying season TD record of 12.

Defensively, captain Hartley Stern and friends limited Gaels to only 284 yards and restricted Queens passing attack to eight completions in 17 attempts for only 136 yards. More importantly, Blues defense stopped Queen's powerful running game cold as all-star Dave Hadden gained only 89 yards with 75 of these coming on the first and last plays of the opening half.

In battling to their decisive 28-3 halftime lead, Blues managed to achieve ball control against a respected defense for the first time this season. After falling behind 3-0 on an early John Wintermeyer field goal, Blues responded with scoring drives of ten, eight, four, ten, and seven plays to effectively settle the outcome within a thirteen-minute period in the second quarter.

In the process, they did manage to confuse both the game officials and the p.a. announcer since television requirements necessitated a change into their dark blue road uniforms with slightly different numbering patterns. Consequently, unknown players or people not even dressed for the game were sometimes credited with outstanding plays.

The game officials, although not as infallible as their illustrious confreres in our own intramural league, had a fairly good afternoon with perhaps only one obviously bad call. Of course, with the Blues grinding out all that yardage, the referees were preoccupied with signalling first downs most of the time. Blues had 41 of them.

Like Waterloo two weeks ago, it turned into an adding machine style football game thanks to Blues aerial attack which saw Dunkley and Brencley complete passes to no less than nine different receivers.

After Donny Thomson's single made the score 3-1, flanker Brent Elsey opened the assault with a short TD catch set up by his own sensational diving grab of a Dunkley pass for a 35-yard gain.

Moments later rookie linebacker Julio Giordani made the first of several outstanding plays by picking off a Queen's pass at the Gaels 45. Four plays later Mark McKley turned safety Alex Morris inside out to score easily on a 15-yard pass.

A sustained drive from their own 27 plus lots of luck and clever scrambling by Dunkley produced the third touchdown as fullback Steve Kwiatowski scored his first OUAA points. A great ending for a good Varsity half of football came at 14:03 when tight end Esteban Andryjowicz caught a 12-yard touchdown pass from Dunkley and Blues went to the dressing room with a 28-3 lead.

In the second half Queens did recover a fumble, did intercept a pass and did get another field goal from Wintermeyer. They also got clobbered as Blues continued to produce the sustained offensive drives and defensively were all over the field restricting Queen's to nine first downs (Gaels had only three in the first half).

Gaels halfback Chris Harber opened Blues second half scoring by obligingly tipping a Dunkley pass into Doret's waiting arms in the Queen's end zone. However, the Varsity halfback earned his other two majors, one on an eight-yard run behind crunching blocking and the final TD on a short pass from Brencley moments before the predictable horde of drunken Queens plumbers tore down the goal posts.

The game was wisely called with thirteen seconds remaining on the clock as a few thousand idiots ran amok about the field in search of more goalposts to destroy.

Blues' field hockey team bullies to second

By LESLIE McINTOSH
and DAINA ZUKAVSKAS

Waterloo Athenas hosted their annual invitational field hockey tournament this past Friday and Saturday. Teams competing were from Lock Haven State U. (Pennsylvania), Michigan State U., McMaster (2 teams), Guelph, Trent, Waterloo and Toronto (2 teams). In formal standings found Toronto second to Lock Haven.

The senior Blues played their first of six games against Lock Haven State. The Americans generally outplayed Toronto in every way; their defence charged the ball and intercepted many Toronto passes; while their forward line cut and created spaces for each other to rush into. The game was a good workout for the Toronto defence, who were faced with a well-disciplined attack from the American forwards.

On the other hand, the Toronto forwards found it difficult to mount any real offensive threat against a thinking Lock Haven defence who managed to keep the ball in their attacking end of the pitch. Nevertheless, Toronto played better than a 5-0 score would indicate, and they proceeded to pull together for a 9-0 victory over McMaster II.

This game was played almost entirely in Mac's defensive end, as Dyanah Prentice (centre forward - 4), Pam Dunbar (right inner - 1), and Jennifer Dakin (left inner - 2) tipped in goals on cross passes from wings Sally Dakin and Barb Richardson. Left wing Richardson had two goals of her own as well. Despite the fact that the game was played against decidedly weak competition, it served to bring cohesiveness to the Toronto team for this and the following game versus Waterloo.

The last game of the day, although the players were tired and the pitch treacherously slippery from the cold rain, was a wide open running and passing match which Toronto won 3-1. Dakin and Prentice contributed a goal apiece, but the crowning goal came on an effort by halfback Anne Halpern, who followed in her own long drive from the top of the circle to the goalie's pads and banged in the rebound.

Tournament play resumed Saturday with Blues pitted against Michigan State. Determined not to let the Americans get the better of them a second time, Toronto went on the attack and didn't let up. The forwards continuously rushed the ball, and all the halfbacks had their chance in the striking circle, too.

Prentice knocked in a goal, as did Richardson. Substitute left inner, Leslie McIntosh (usually left halfback), also scored but the goal was disallowed by an offside player. On the rare occasions that Michigan managed to get the ball down to their offensive end, the Toronto fullbacks and goalkeeper cleared it back to their own forwards easily enough.

This game was characteristic of all 3 Saturday games, in that the ball rarely left Toronto's offensive end, a credit to halfbacks Debbie Wilson, Anne Halpern and Daina Zukauskas, as well as the forwards. The final score, 2-1 for the Blues.

Toronto next met Guelph, strong contenders in last week's Earlybird Tournament at York and one of the two teams who defeated Blues there. Showing excellent form this time, Toronto again had a mainly offensive game. The lone goal was beautifully scored by Richardson on a long pass across the striking circle from Dakin. Guelph failed to score, thanks to excellent work by goalkeeper Liz Novachis, who cleared the Gryphons' few shots well out of the circle, and Sue Scott, who successfully prevented a "sure goal" in a penalty bully.

(A penalty bully, for the uninitiated, is taken by a defender who fouls in the striking circle, preventing a certain goal, and any opposing player. The ball is played until a goal is scored, the ball leaves the circle, or a player fouls.) Thus the game ended in Toronto's favour 1-0.

The final match of the weekend against McMaster I again showed Blues' strength, in a very offensive game. Tired players continued to rush on goal, keeping pressure on Mac's defence. Well-placed free hits and excellent interceptions by the Toronto defence kept the ball over the 50 yard line (centre) most of the time.

Tackles (taking the ball away) by fullbacks Chris Crawford and Sue Scott took care of the rest. In spite of numerous penalty corners taken by Toronto, the Blues failed to get the ball in the net (but it was close!) and the tournament closed with a scoreless game.

This weekend ended exhibition play for the field hockey teams.

OWIAA league play is on the next two weekends: October 26-27 is Part I at McMaster; November 2-3 is the final hockey tournament at Guelph.

Intermediate by ELEANOR HOWEY

The intermediate team also played in the tournament in the same group as the seniors. Although their play was aggressive and fairly closely matched with their opponents, they lacked the finishing ability to notch winning tallies.

In their first three games they were shut out 4-0 by McMaster seniors, 3-0 by Guelph, and 1-0 by Michigan State. Ann Hoffman finally broke the scoring drought, winning a penalty bully against Waterloo, but Toronto still lost 2-1.

In their final game the intermediates met the McMaster intermediates, who tied with them last weekend. The Toronto's squad's determination finally paid off as Betty Shostak scored the only goal to give the Blues the win.

The competition against the senior teams was good experience, but hardly indicative of the intermediate chances in the OWIAA title, starting next week at McMaster.

First quorum in 3 years, Arts Council still the same

By BOB BETTSON

It took three years, but the mammoth 1350 member Arts and Science Faculty Council finally got a quorum Monday of 150 members and proceeded to vote down a proposed faculty curriculum committee which would have taken over some of the functions of the all-faculty Academic Standards Committee.

The proposal was part of the Beryne Implementation Report which recommended a restructuring of the council's committee system.

The Council, which includes all faculty above the rank of lecturer and only 52 students, has not been able to meet for the last two years. It last met during the parity struggle of 1970-71 when students paralysed the council and its general committee in an unsuccessful bid to gain staff-student parity. Since then, the two scheduled meetings failed to materialize because of a lack of quorum.

The council has been criticized by students as unrepresentative, but it has ultimate responsibility for decision-making in the faculty despite its recent inactivity.

The 200 member General Committee of the faculty makes most decisions but the council can prevent any fundamental change in decision making structures. In 1971 it vetoed staff-student parity.

The faculty curriculum committee, proposed by the Beryne implementation report, was intended to approve courses and review present courses as well as taking broad responsibility in the area of curriculum.

This would have taken away part of the function of the Academic Standards Committee which now meets in secret and includes only faculty.

The proposal needed a two-thirds majority to pass but only received a 75-58 affirmative vote. Although the few student members present and a large number of liberal faculty voted in favour, the conservative faculty from the history and political economy departments were out in force.

Political economy professor Peter Silcox presented the rationale for the opposition, claiming that "academic standards needs to do more work...it is broadly representative. The present structure is working reasonably well."

Innis principal Peter Russell disagreed: "The academic standards committee is far too large. Though I am not a supporter of parity there must be some student input."

The Beryne proposal was to have a ten member committee with at least three students and three faculty elected from an electoral college of the members of the general committee's curriculum committees.

However Victoria College principal Jack Robson summed up the conservative viewpoint: "Education isn't politics and representative government can't deal with academic standards."

Another proposal to set up a committee on instruction and evaluation was passed 78-34 with an amendment by Robson to change parity student-faculty membership on a 12-member committee to 11 faculty out of 16 members.

The committee will deal with methods of evaluation, teaching, grading and class sizes. Robson stressed that his amendment to double faculty membership was because "some people have more capacity to evaluate than others. They also have a responsibility to see policies carried out."

The committee will be elected by the general committee at its next meeting. A motion to double the student membership to correspond with faculty was defeated overwhelmingly.

The council adjourned because of lack of quorum before deciding on a final Beryne recommendation which would have set up a committee to examine how to increase the council's effectiveness. The debate had degenerated into quibbling over representation from various parts of the faculty. A motion to increase student membership on the striking committee with additional student members from each college was not discussed.

Student interest has faded considerably since the parity struggle in 1970-71 when students voted overwhelmingly for parity representation then were frustrated by the heavily faculty-dominated council.

In fact most student seats were won by acclamation last year and the voting turnout in the last two years has been less than five per cent. Few of the 50 student members even bother attending monthly meetings of the general committee. Only a handful attended the council.

Since then the general committee and council have floundered, failing to reach quorum on at least five occasions. Further student attempts to increase representation and other student motions have been defeated.

However the inactivity of the committees has left power in the hands of individual departments and the all-faculty academic standards committee.

As Peter Russell said "there is a large gap" in decision making structures and too much is left to what he called "backroom negotiations with the dean."

Students continuing lack of interest in the governing structures seems to have paralleled the consistent rejection by faculty and administration of any substantial student input in any of the committees where the power lies.

Allende secretary says 5,000 wait to leave Chile

Fernanda Navarro speaking at the plush Westbury hotel.

By TIM GALLAGHER

There may be "as many as 5,000 people in embassies in Chile waiting to leave the country," said Fernanda Navarro, personal secretary to Hortensia Allende, widow of the late president of Chile.

Speaking at a Toronto press conference Monday, she said there were up to 400 people in the Argentine embassy alone which has crowded that embassy to the point that sleeping has to be done in shifts.

Navarro elaborated on the many eye-witness reports from Canadians that the doors to the Canadian embassy in Santiago are locked shut.

She said the reason for this is because "Canada doesn't have a treaty with Chile allowing the Canadian embassy to give refugees safe conduct out of the country."

Canada does not "want to be left with refugees in its embassy as they could be there for the next 10 or 15 years," she said, explaining the embassy could only provide a sanctuary.

Navarro and Mrs. Allende escaped from Chile last month shortly after the military coup overthrew the Allende government and the murder of Salvador Allende.

She announced that Mrs. Allende will be visiting Canada next month.

Navarro said that Canada has taken 16 refugees from Chile and helped to pay their plane fares and accommodation, but once they are established in Canada they would have to re-imburse the Canadian government.

This statement came in contrast with a statement two weeks ago in the same hotel (the Westbury) when Robert Andras, immigration minister, said there were actually only 15 refugees who came to Canada from the Canadian embassy in Santiago.

A reporter who slipped into the CP Air plane at Malton airport reported there were 17 Chileans on board.

Andras said the Chileans were not in Canada as refugees but as visitors with special minister's permits allowing them to stay in Canada for three months on the understanding they might have to leave Canada at the end of that time.

So far none of them has applied for refugee status under the Immigration Act.

Navarro said one of her reasons for being in Canada was to help organize support for Chilean refugees. She said currently those in Chile wanting to leave for Canada have to go to the Santiago embassy and apply for landed immigrant status there.

This process could take up to two months she said. Canadian immigration authorities have said that this is currently the policy.

However immigration authorities still deny the doors to the embassy are locked shut, despite numerous eyewitness accounts to the contrary.

Navarro said she felt the United States helped the Chilean military manoeuvre the coup because the Allende government was "a threat to imperialism" and "represented promise for the third world."

The labor unrest and massive strikes in Chile prior to the coup she ascribed to a "very well orchestrated escape."

At present the military junta is committing "atrocities against basic human rights" Navarro said. Those who fled Chile will be "organizing all people who are against fascism." They want "the same support as shown against the Vietnam war" she said.

In a more optimistic tone she said "the junta does not have complete control of the situation" and that "a state of war exists in Chile."

SAC brings NUS good news others expect to join soon

British Columbia, two from Alberta, two from Saskatchewan, none from Manitoba, two from Quebec six from Nova Scotia and two from New Brunswick which have joined NUS.

The main function for NUS, according to Moses, is to provide a national lobby for students in Ottawa, where NUS headquarters are located, and to serve as an information-sharing vehicle for various student bodies for problems of national concern.

Some of the resolutions passed at the weekend conference reflect that orientation, among them:

- That NUS get grant money to expand a national newsletter;
- That NUS research and put forward a policy regarding inequalities in post-secondary education in Canada;

- That NUS collect, summarize, and distribute a summary of both federal and provincial master plans about education and any government policy recommendations;
- That NUS examine the status of women on Canadian campuses especially in the areas of academic, financial and accessibility problems and "collate existing pertinent reports";

- That NUS examine the possibility of having the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation amend the National Housing Act so that mortgage payments for non-profit housing such as student housing be based on a monthly occupancy rate rather than a fixed rate.

Moses said U of T's Graduate Student Union, OISE, and McMaster university had representatives at the conference as observers and the representatives expressed keen interest in having their bodies join NUS.

Formed last year, NUS is the first national body representing students since the collapse of the Canadian Union of Students (CUS) in 1969.

Last weekend's meeting at the University of Alberta was the third one for NUS, following a national meeting last May and the founding meeting last November.

Many NUS delegates expressed the hope that U of T's entry into the organization would spur other schools into joining.

To date there are six colleges and universities from Ontario, eight from Policy formation at NUS is considerably different than CUS, which received criticism for being too much out of touch with the students it was supposed to have been representing.

Moses said that while the decision making structure of NUS is slow and admittedly bureaucratic, it ensures that NUS keeps in touch with its student bodies.

Before a resolution can become NUS policy, it must be circulated by mail to student bodies, NUS said, and the various student elected bodies must send back their yes or no answer. A majority of the schools in NUS must approve a policy or resolution before it becomes part of NUS.

For example, Moses said, the resolutions passed at last weekend's conference require a mailed-ballot scheme to become official, but Moses said that that will probably be an academic effort in this case mainly because there was an overwhelming approval of the resolutions.

The financial report at the weekend conference indicates that NUS is expecting to operate on a $45,444 annual budget.

As sources of the funds, the report lists a $9,444 grant from the federal government for translations, the remaining $30,000 to come from NUS-leveled assessments of student governments. The rate is 30 cents per student to be taken out of student fees.

Hydro threatens U of T greenery

Gerhard Moog's big money-maker, the Hydro headquarters, causing U of T's botany department a few problems.

Sitting in the shadow of the proposed headquarters at College and University is the botany department's greenhouse, and, without consulting them, Hydro went ahead and made plans without concern for the green things contained therein.

"We will have to get some lawyers involved," said department chairman Jack Dainty, and their decision will be taken to a meeting with Hydro some time in the future. It's possible the compromise will involve Hydro paying for artificial lighting for the plants.

below the poverty datum line, including Alcan, a Canadian company which "says it realizes that people are its most important assets but pays 703 out of 706 black employees less than $131.60 a month."

This contrasts with Alcan's profit last year of over $4,970,000. "Yet supposedly they can't afford to pay anymore."

He charged that Ford is "reinforcing the system by fragmenting skilled jobs under pressure from the white trade unions."

Massey Ferguson has assets of $28 million in South Africa and pre-tax yields are over twice that of other company operations. However Nangle found that almost 70 per cent of their employees are paid less than $100 a month.

Though Zimbabwe is an "illegal" state not recognized by any country in the world Canadian corporations are operating there and breaking United Nations sanctions as well as Canadian law.

Nangle said that even when he informed the Canadian department of trades, industry and commerce about operations of Bata and Falconbridge, they claimed they were "totally unaware that the companies were operating there."

Nangle said he found this "difficult to believe" because Bata has been operating since 1943 and Falconbridge since 1948. Falconbridge is only paying its black workers 56 cents a day while paying whites $800 a month.

He also revealed that Bata is making 27,000 pairs of shoes a month and exporting a large number to South Africa, breaking United Nations sanctions.

The Canadian government's aid policies also came under fire from Nangle, who gave the example of a power plant being built in Botswana which will serve mining corporations in South Africa.

The "muddled" Canadian policy also includes renegotiating preferential tariff to South Africa despite the avowed government policy condemning the racist regime.

A member of the audience from the Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Portuguese African Colonies added that a consortium of Canadian banks including Canadian Imperial and Toronto-Dominion has loaned $200 million to prop up the South African government.

Journalist condemns Canadian imperialism

By BOB BETTSON

Montreal journalist Hugh Nangle condemned Canadian corporations for continuing their operations in South Africa and "further entrenching the racist regime" at a Cinema of Solidarity meeting Sunday.

Nangle, born in Zimbabwe (Rhodesia) and educated in South Africa recently returned from South Africa after doing research on Canadian corporate involvement in the economy.

He told the audience that the "face of Canada in South Africa is the activities of Canadian corporations such as Alcan, Falconbridge and Ford."

Canadian investment in South Africa is over $100 million, Nangle said that "the Canadian government could take a moral stance and order its termination... but it doesn't want to do this."

He charged that Canadian policy is two-faced.

"While the government makes pious statements at the United Nations it allows trade with anyone," he added.

While Ford Canada is one of the "best" employers in South Africa, he explained that wages for the predominantly black labor force are only barely above the poverty datum line which allows for "only the bare necessities to avoid starvation."

Nangle said most companies pay

Vic tokenism turned down

Victoria University students are waiting to find out what sort of representation they will have on Vic's board of regents.

Last week, a proposal to have only one student on the 43-member board was turned down, according to Brian Gazley of Vic's Student Administrative Council (VUSAC).

Gazley says the next step is for the board's executive to meet to consider the issue. The executive was directed to bring forth a recommendation to the board's next meeting on Nov. 15. So far an executive meeting has not been scheduled, Gazley said.

In the brief presented to the board last week, VUSAC told the board that the Victoria University Act provides that a maximum of eight students may sit on the board.

The problem stems from the boards offer to seat only one student. There is not a minimum requirement in the act.

The students are hoping that their proposal will get through, although they are in much the same position as the faculty, Gazley said.

He explained that the faculty have also been offered one seat on the board, but so far there has been no indication of the faculty's response to this offer.

Gazley points to the "legality" of the student proposal since it is embodied in the university's act.

In the brief, students pointed out:

"The act provides for full student representation on the board of regents. Students comprise the majority in this community; yet, they are not represented with a vote on this board nor on the senate."

"This anomaly seems to us to be a breach of basic civil liberties. With this in mind, we are in consultation with the Canadian Civil Liberties Association."

"We believe that the offer of one student position on the board of regents of Victoria University is merely a token of the principle of student representation."

"This compels us, most regretfully, to decline this offer."

"Student" a four-letter word in faculty report

To read the Faculty Association reply to the Task Force on Academic Appointments, one would think students simply do not exist.

In nine pages of tightly-typed prose, the word "student" does not appear once in reference to tenure or staffing decisions.

The report verifies comments made earlier by association president William Nelson who said the association turned down the idea of student participation in tenure and staffing decisions.

The report was sent to university president John Evans on October 10 as a reply to the Forster Task Force report on Academic Appointments.

In only two tangential references to the Forster report, the association reply indicates it rejects (without giving a reason) a proposal in the Forster report which would give students token presence on tenure granting committees.

In an interview last week, Nelson said he and a minority of the executive which put together the association report had no objection to student participation, but nowhere did the report indicate that this minority position exists.

While the association position preserves the status quo of no students representation, it does make recommendations for more openness among the staff as the staff decides tenure.

Where the Forster report flatly turns down the prospect of a faculty member appearing before the departmental committee deciding whether he gets tenure, the association reply indicates that the faculty member ought to appear before the committee.

The association reply says that there would be value of an untenured staff member explained his own case, and adds that this would be a good psychological approach.

"We regard it as necessary that the candidate, so far as is possible, see that the committee is acting fairly and that he or she be given an effective opportunity to challenge any evidence before the committee."

"At worst, this right may offer only a psychological benefit to the candidate, but even this may be worth the time and effort involved. At best it may prevent a serious mistake being made."

While the association recommendation would probably blunt some of the criticism of some untenured staff that tenure is decided in a "star chamber," it does not go all the way to a hearing similar to that in court rooms.

"We do not envisage the right of the candidate (for tenure) to appear as in general permitting him or her to introduce new evidence," the association document says. "The candidate has already had the opportunity to put in any evidence he or she wants."

"We do believe that the candidate should have the right to see all the evidence put before the committee — appraisals could be presented anonymously — and to comment on it and on the reasons for the decision before the committee has reached a final conclusion."

Perhaps the most striking difference between the association's recommendations and the Forster report is in this easing of the closed-door policy toward tenure.

The association says that a negative decision on tenure should be tentative only. At that point the candidate would be informed of the decision and its reasons in writing and be given a chance to rebut them in person before the departmental committee.

Only after such a second hearing could the departmental committee turn down tenure.

The association report says that the proposals in the Forster report for appealing negative tenure decisions to the university president "are, in general, adequate."

"We wish to recommend, however," the association says, "that the right of the appellant to appear in person before the committee be ensured."

The Forster report waffles on that point, saying an appellant can give oral or written presentation only "as the (appeal) committee may direct."

While advocating a somewhat more open procedure for the appeal procedure for negative tenure appeals the association stops short of what it calls an "adversary setting" such as is characterized in a legal appeal of a court case.

It does not give any reason, however, for stopping short of an adversary system, saying only "We do not believe that the department should defend its procedures in an adversary setting before the dean in any case of non-renewal of probationary appointment, or that the same obligation is imposed on the tenure committee."

The association also urges great care in selection of who is to sit on committees reviewing tenure decisions.

The report suggests that members on the committee be persons "who are not in any way, for example, dependent on the goodwill of any person who may be regarded as having an interest in the outcome of the review."

"In short," the report says without citing examples of past committees, "the impartiality of the members must be above reproach."

The association seems concerned enough about this recommendation of who sits on review committees that it recommends "that the candidate be invited to indicate if there is any individual whom he would not want to see on his review committee and to show cause why such an individual should not be appointed."

"Perhaps, in addition, the candidate should have the right to show cause to the president why any particular member who has been appointed should be removed," the report said.

The faculty association does seem to side with a minority position on the Forster task force regarding dismissal of tenured staff for fiscal reasons.

While the majority of the task force blithely accepted the notion and put together a contingency plan for firing professors if the money runs out, a minority of the Forster committee was heatedly opposed to the notion.

The association was likewise opposed to endorsement of layoffs for financial reasons unless "the university's survival was at stake."

"We are opposed to the university taking any immediate action on this matter," the association report says. "The (Forster) task force should reconvene to give further consideration to this and to receive representations from interested individuals and groups."

The association nit-picks with some of the current Haurt rules, the rules which generally govern the final appeals of negative tenure decisions and "dismissal for cause," the only current procedure for firing a professor who may tenure.

The association only calls for a minor re-wording of one obscure clause in dismissal for cause, which essentially is tacit approval of the current system which makes it almost impossible to fire a tenured professor who may tenure.

The association also suggests a minor rewording of the conditions for appeal of a no-tenure decision as compared to the Forster report — which made no major changes in its recommendations.

Many Christians misjudge Zionism

We, the undersigned, a group of Christians in Toronto, moved by the tragic war now raging in the Middle East, wish to express our concern for the victims of this conflict, and wish, in particular, to share some Christian reflections both with the larger Christian community and with the community at large. The following observations are made with a deep sense of Christian contrition for the many past "silences" of the churches at those critical moments when the Christian conscience has been tested, and found wanting. We believe that another crisis of conscience has arrived, and that, on no account, must another silence be condoned.

The Arab-Israeli struggle has for years been coloured by a mythology which continues to obscure the political and human dimensions of the collision of two peoples in the Middle East. This is the mythology of a Zionism consistently represented by anti-Zionists as a racist, imperialistic Nazi-type creed imposed upon the Middle East to dispossess and oppress non-Jews, and to establish presumably a 'Jewish Empire'. Many Christians, unfamiliar with Zionist ideas, having been more or less persuaded of the basic truth of this mythology, tend as a result to interpret present-day events in its light. Thus, the current war is regarded as a war of liberation designed to remove the Zionist yoke in the name of humanity and justice. Such Christians are frequently disbelieving if informed that (a) Zionism is not a dirty word, like Nazism, but a complex phenomenon with its roots in both Jewish tradition and modern Jewish experience; (b) modern Zionism was born as the stepchild of western gentile anti-semitism - the anti-semitism of the Christian churches and a Christian culture - and was therefore an early liberation movement incorporating the response of disillusioned European Jews to the hostility of a Christian-Gentile world which refused to accept their presence; (c) the rhetoric of anti-Zionism is as old as the Zionist movement itself (that masterpiece of modern anti-semitism, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, was published about the time of the first Zionist Congress in 1897), and every important anti-semitic of this century has made repeated use of this rhetoric, from Henry Ford to Adolf Hitler to current Russian propaganda. One example illustrates this trend. In Mein Kampf, Hitler attacked (Zionist) Jews for seeking to build a Jewish empire in the Middle East as "a central organization for their international world swindle...". Incidentally, the Protocols are presently in widespread circulation in the Arab-Islamic world, and definitely a factor in the Middle Eastern struggle.

To understand the issues fairly, this mythology must be stripped away. When it is gone, one sees the tragic encounter of two peoples, each with legitimate claims and aspirations, over the same territory. Christians are involved on both sides of this encounter. They are involved on the Arab side, because modern Arab nationalism owes some of its roots to the Christian missionary presence since the last century. They are involved on the Jewish side, because Jewish nationalism is the stepchild of Christian prejudice, and because Israel, by its very existence, is both a reminder and a rebuke to Christians for their role in the Jewish plight in the twentieth century, with its holocaust and its murdered children. Israel, to Jews, is more than another nation; it is a resurrection symbol following the near extinction of the Jewish people within living memory. For this reason, we believe, Christians must affirm Israel as the visible and tangible manifestation of both Jewish survival and Jewish security. For the possibility of a second Auschwitz is something which no Christian should view with equanimity and any semblance of moral neutrality. Indeed, as matters now stand, the option of remaining neutral in an apparent life-and-death struggle does not exist. To affirm Israel is not to pretend that Israel, as a nation-state, stands above the moral criteria derived from the canons of international justice and conscience of rational man which apply to other nations. Clearly, no nation-state is innocent or can be innocent, since power, especially military power, is always subject to misuse, and nation-states by definition are vast impersonal concentrations of power. Once the Jewish state was born, it took upon itself the moral ambiguity of a world replete with power-struggles, and the moral dilemmas which are always entailed in the possession of power. Israel can be criticized as any other nation can be criticized, but it is profoundly wrong to oppose Israel because of its Jewish foundations, and to seek to dismantle its Jewish character, as the anti-Zionists invariably desire. In a military conflict in which the apparent object is not merely the recovery of occupied territory, but the destruction of the Jewish political community, and, if Arab rhetoric is to be taken literally, to "drive the Zionists into the sea", Christians must, in our view, stand with Israel, and stand without equivocation.

The plight of the Palestinian refugees is a cause which has stirred much Christian sympathy, and which has become the focal point for the convergence of liberal sentiment (Christian and non-Christian) and the ideology of the Third World with its Marxist analysis. Israel has been identified by both groups as the oppressor, the Palestinian Arabs as the oppressed. This plight, in our view, is the other side of the tragic encounter between the aspirations of two peoples: tragic because injustice in one form or another is seemingly unavoidable. Christians are involved on this side of the conflict as well. In our opinion, however, the present attack of the Arab nations against Israel cannot be justified in these terms, because the former have themselves repeatedly revealed no small measure of indifference to the refugees during recent years. Moreover, in much Christian opinion, the refugees have unwittingly emerged as a comfort for a troubled conscience, which, preferring not to dwell on Christian guilt with regard to the Jews, dwells instead on Jewish guilt with regard to the Arabs. Nor are the Churches in a position of moral objectivity whereby they can successfully play a mediatorial role between the Jewish and Arab worlds, balancing the claims and counter-claims of the two warring communities. We have long since disqualified ourselves for any such task, and should not adopt an attitude of moral superiority in a situation which exposes too many of our own failings.

Ontario and Africa: trade helps racism

Ontario's provincial government will be sending its trade mission to South Africa on October 31, according to Michael Cooper-Slipper, a provincial government industrial development officer.

The eight-member delegation from the Davis government will be accompanied by seven representatives from manufacturing interests in Ontario, Cooper-Slipper said.

The trade mission to South Africa provoked heated debate in the provincial legislature last week, as MPPs hurled verbal abuse at each other during question period, but little substantive information about the mission emerged from the house.

Cooper-Slipper said the trade mission will be primarily a selling mission, interested in trade items such as automotive parts, fishing lines, farm machinery and wall paper. He said the main emphasis in trade would be on consumer goods rather than capital equipment.

When asked about the debate in the legislature about the mission and particularly the objections raised by NDP leader Stephen Lewis, Cooper-Slipper replied, "my business is running mines, not getting mixed up in politics."

Protests against the trade mission are mounting. Labor unions, liberation support groups, churches and other organizations such as the YWCA and Oxfam have sent resolutions to the Davis government urging the trade mission be cancelled.

The African National Congress, the National Association of South Africans in Canada, and the Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Portugal's African Colonies, have called a demonstration for tomorrow at Queen's Park at 4 pm.

During the legislative debate, minister of industry and tourism Claude Bennett, defended the South African trade mission, saying that the government "sends trade missions where we think there is economic advantage to this country and this province . . . we are principally concerned about how we can advance the cause of Ontario."

That cause received scathing criticism from John Saul of the Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Portugal's African Colonies: "Canadian trade with South Africa and investment there represent quite precisely Canada's complicity with the oppressive system of apartheid. There are no two sides to the argument."

"Of course, we must be better prepared in order to carry the struggle against this situation directly to Canada's corporations themselves, but in the present case we can at least demand that public funds and official sanction not be used to facilitate this kind of 'dirty business.'"

The Northern Miner, in its issue of September 13, 1972, carries the headline: "Southern Africa Boom Inevitable."

It goes on to detail spectacular base metal finds being announced monthly with ten major base metal ore-bodies discovered since 1969.

The Northern Miner makes parallels with similar earlier booms in Canada and Australia.

It suggests that in South Africa we will now see the era of "junior mining companies" springing up with exploration programs in response to these recent discoveries of base metals by the major foreign corporations who until now have been concentrating on gold and diamonds.

Falconbridge Nickel Mines, known for its development of the Sudbury area, is also active. Falconbridge has a copper-silver operation at Oamites in South West Africa which is the most modern mine in Southern Africa. It cost seven million dollars to bring into production and has the South African Development Corporation with a 25 per cent interest in the operation. Falconbridge also operates a gold mine in Zimbabwe (Rhodesia), Blanket Mines, although the Canadian industry, trade and commerce department claim not to know of it and Falconbridge annual reports make no reference to it.

Blanket Mines executives revealed a 1972 profit of $1.3 million. The starting pay of the 500 Africans employed by the mine is 56 cents a day for a six day week. Some Africans who have worked for Falconbridge for more than 20 years in Rhodesia receive only $43.74 and $48.60 per month. The two room corrugated sheet buildings for the Africans are in stark contrast to the luxurious life of the white mine workers.

Falconbridge has recently sold its Connemara Mine in Rhodesia, according to a senior officer of the Falconbridge. It was sold to the Smith regime in Rhodesia with full knowledge that it was to be turned into a detention centre for political prisoners.

The Northern Miner reports other Canadian based mining companies are also getting into the act. International Nickel Company and Noranda Mines are equally anxious to enjoy the high profits based on the cheap labor supply and friendly arrangements with the South African state. Noranda is about to drill a surface copper occurrence near Windhoek owned by a recently arrived Canadian junior company, International Bibis Tin Mines. Placer Management has also arrived within the last six months. Canadian consultants and service companies support the operations too with Scintrex, Geotrex, McPhar and A.C.A. Howe International all bringing Canadian personnel and Canadian exploration techniques onto the scene.

The control by the white minority regime of 87 per cent of the land in South Africa forced the majority black population to choose between two alternatives: subsistence farming on over populated native reserves with its consequent poverty and malnutrition or joining the ranks of cheap labour in mining, manufacturing and domestic service. The South African economy is both expanding and expansionist. Within its borders, South Africa make 30 per cent of the continent's total income, produces 43 per cent of the continent's total mineral wealth, produces twice as much electricity and puts out six times as much steel as the rest of the African continent combined. It is building up its own armaments industry (Alcan contributes here) and exports both capital and industrial products abroad. South Africa is encroaching politically, economically and militarily on countries to the north.

Anyone disobeying these laws will be imprisoned, fined, and/or whipped:

All Africans over the age of 16 must produce a passbook on demand by a policeman.

Under no circumstances may an employer pay Africans the same rates as white persons even if they do the same work and work the same hours.

No African may strike for any reason whatsoever.

Any African who takes a job outside his town, even if he has lived there for 20 years, must leave that town within 72 hours.

Unless they have obtained a special permit to do so, a white person and a non-white person may not under any circumstances drink a cup of tea together in a cafe.

No white person may have sexual relations with an African, Coloured or Indian person. And vice versa.

No African may attend a birthday party if the number attending could make the gathering undesirable.

An African in an urban area who is out of work must take work offered to him by the Bantu Affairs Commissioner or be removed from the area.

No African may buy land, or own property, anywhere in the Republic.

Under no circumstances may a non-white person use facilities set aside for the use of white persons.

No white man may teach an African servant to read.

The apartheid system has shown itself infinitely adaptive to these changing conditions. Those holding out for a peaceful solution in Southern Africa have insisted that that apartheid was bound to break down as a result of demands for more skilled and semi-skilled workers and for an expanding internal market. Three sets of mechanisms have been devised, however, to ensure that blacks can do little or nothing except serve as cheap labour. They are filtered into jobs formerly closed to them without undermining the status of white workers.

The first is simply less pay for equal work. A white man is promoted; an African is hired to do his job, usually changing the name of the job in the process. Hundreds of Africans are employed in the fiercely competitive building trade, for example, doing the jobs of skilled and semi-skilled workers reserved by law for whites but are being classified and paid as Africans.

The second adaptation of apartheid is "dilution" or "fragmentation" of jobs. A job previously done by a white worker on his own is subdivided so that the most skilled and best paid part continues to be done by the white while Africans are brought in to do the rest. In the mines, the pressure for job fragmentation is enormous. Average pay in mines for whites is £205 per month while African pay is £10. By 1969, Africans made up 90.2 per cent of Southern Africa's gold miners, much of this cheap labor pool coming from the client states surrounding South Africa such as Mozambique and Lesotho. The whites become "supervisors" and "technicians" with commensurate pay increases in return for releasing tasks to non-whites. Thus the color bar "floats up" rather than breaking down.

Thirdly, the apartheid system has adapted by setting up border areas near the "homelands" or "reserves" for industrial development. Here incentives of tax rebates, loans from the Industrial Development Corporation, cheap water, power, and rail rates are thrown in along with the cheap labor next door. The company has the chance to pay Africans whatever it likes. White workers have complained about low-wage policies in border areas endangering their livelihood. Ironically, black workers are being most affected. Urban employers now use border area wage rates as a basis for comparison in order to reduce urban wage rates for Africans.

Writer of Israel article replies

I waited until today to reply to a number of letters concerning the article "War in the East: Back to the Tanks" which appeared on Friday the 12th, because I had expected more varied reaction, instead of an hysterical outburst.

I made no claims of objectivity in that article. I only reported my views as obtained from what I have seen in that part of the world. Israel was created in 1948. In my opinion wrongly, but now she is a fact, and therefore all talk of erasing Israel from the map is ridiculous; however, it is the duty of the United Nations and all of its membership to not simply ensure her existence but these countries are by the same token to see that Israel is prevented from acquiring territory that does not belong to her by force, as was the case in 1967. Unless the Arab nations are restored their territory, and unless there is a just settlement with the Palestinians, I guarantee there will be a war every decade until a final resolution of the problem. Arab leaders on many occasions expressed their willingness to recognize Israel's boundaries and settle for peace in exchange for the above.

Statements by one correspondent that Arabs in Israel are better off than in the Arab countries is the same argument used by the South Africans to justify and excuse their abhorrent racist dictatorship over the black population. Look around in such cities of occupied Jordan as Jerusalem, and Hebron, and you will find it hard to find any intellectuals, politicians or authors, for the Israelis expel them more often than without pretext. Sure life in Israel is better for a demoralized Arab peasant with little ambition, but for anyone other than he — and who is non-Jewish — there is no life at all. Traditionally Islamic countries have welcomed Jews in their lands even while western European nations did not, and that it is only as a result of the persecutions of Arabs and such events as the massacre of Deir Yassin and Kafir Qasim in 1948 and 1956 respectively, which have led to a political mistrust of a few Jews native to Arab countries, but ask the Moroccan Jews how they like being spat upon and being discriminated against by their European fellow citizens in Israel who hate them for they are closer to Arabs than to the foreign environment afforded to them by Israel.

Personally I am not optimistic that the world will have learned the lesson from this latest outbreak of fighting. I think that it will take the United States a few years of freezing during the winter to teach them and their fellow travellers to think a little harder as to who is kidding whom.

Arab oil boycott isn't blackmail

I don't know much about the present fighting in the Middle East, but what I can not help noticing is that whenever anyone mentions anything critical of Israel, so many people who have never been there, and who therefore know nothing about it, seem to jump on the Zionist bandwagon. I don't know if the Israelis were preparing to strike or not, but it is odd to me that when someone comes in and occupies land that does not belong to them, the United States gets up tight and says that Israel is threatened when the Arabs resort to the last thing left, namely military conquest, to restore her territory to her rule. Likewise, when the Arabs cut off their own oil supply, in order to prevent wholesale American intervention on behalf of her Jewish clients, why is this regarded as "blackmail"? Were the Americans to cut off oil to Canada for their own use, it would be "for their own advantage". Enough is enough. This is why it was refreshing to read Mr. Roger's article instead of the stale repeats from the pro-Israeli fanatics.

Israeli law is not based on religion

Typical of the untruths that pro-Arab people used as "facts" at the "mass-democracy" meeting at Sidney Smith on Tuesday was the following. A Palestinian woman said that Israel's constitution was fascist and based on religion. What exactly, if anything, she meant by "fascist" I do not know, but I was going to ask her what it was in Israel's constitution that was based on religion. Amidst the general screaming I did not get a chance to ask my question, but later I remembered that Israel does not even have a constitution! The individual rights of citizens are protected, instead of a constitution, by the general law of the state, based like Canadian law on the principles of English Common Law. Such rights include equality before the law regardless of religion.

In addition to Common Law, the law of Israel is based on relics of the Ottoman Law, Palestinian legislation under Britain, and Israeli legislation. It is not based on Jewish religious law. Religious laws apply only in matter of personal status such as marriage and divorce, and only to members of the religious community concerned. Thus there are rabbinical courts, Moslem courts, Christian courts, and Druze courts. Most of the disputes, moreover, that arise within the Beduin Arab community are settled by the Tribal Court held near Beer-Sheva, which is composed of Sheiks and rules according to tribal customs. I am sure there is enough reliable literature on this in our libraries.

New indignation

On behalf of ourselves and other members of New College we would like to express our indignation at the editorial board for their commentary of October 22 concerning Dr. Ivey. It is difficult to restrain oneself from countering the quotes and paraphrases taken out of context, the false allusions, the improvable implications of many statements, the blatant lies, and the utter pettiness, at least one of which was evident in every point put forward by the article, but we will. Let the expression of our indignation suffice.

Canada lacks policy but not energy

Sheik Lougheed of Emirate of Alberta may belong to the same party as Bill Davis, but you wouldn't know it after watching them fight over oil.

By FRANCOIS BREGHA

In 1973, Canada faces its very own energy crisis, one which, in many ways, may be infinitely more serious than the more publicized fuel shortages south of the border. The Canadian crisis is not one of shortages — although these may indeed occur this winter — but one of policy.

Despite Energy Minister Macdonald's claim to the contrary, Canada never has had a co-ordinated and comprehensive energy policy. Jack Austin, deputy minister of energy, mines and resources, was more candid in his assessment of this policy vacuum when he admitted in May 1972 that Canada then had (and still has) an energy policy "by chance".

But whereas in the past Canada could afford to drift along complacently without the semblance of even the most rudimentary policy, powerful pressures arising from the American "energy crisis" make it dangerously clear that Canada may now be facing one of its most difficult challenges since Confederation; for energy policy constitutes the central pillar around which any industrial strategy must evolve. Should we ever lose the ability to formulate policy independently, we would be faced with the prospect of remaining "hewers of wood and drawers of water" in perpetuity.

Energy policy central to industrial future

Given the central importance of energy policy to the very survival of this nation, it is not surprising that the formulation of such a policy is emerging as the major political issue of the 1970's. The upcoming energy debate promises to be emotionally charged since it involves many of the traditional issues which have preoccupied Canadians since Confederation. Federal-provincial relations, for instance, long in disharmony, may be strained further by jurisdictional disputes over off shore oil and gas deposits, and pricing and export criteria. Canadian-American relations, historically shaped by the dominance of our southern neighbour, will be influenced crucially by our attitudes towards the pace and purpose of our domestic energy developments.

"I would expect to have a very extensive public debate. I would be glad to appear back on this platform in the same way — and others across the country — to decide these particular questions. As I said, this is not a question in which we feel the government of Canada alone can arrive at a conclusion so what we are going to be doing is involved in a consensus process to have a very broad discussion both in parliament and out".

The energy debate will also be divisive: the fragmented distribution of power among several decision makers, along with the internecine squabbling that so typifies the Canadian predicament, is the most significant characteristic of the domestic energy scene. The development and implementation of a co-ordinated and successful strategy to bargain with the American giant may require, however, a radical restructuring of traditional policy-making. But Ottawa until now has shown itself quite reluctant to assume the burden of this restructuring.

The lack of any strong federal leadership in the field of energy has often been explained away by Macdonald as a reflection of the two main facts of the Canadian energy scene: the jurisdictional division of power between the federal and provincial governments and our unquestioned commitment to private enterprise. According to Macdonald's definition, the private sector — i.e., the multinational corporations — the provinces, the National Energy Board, and the federal government — to name the four most important decision-makers in energy — all constitute Canada's energy policy. So Macdonald claims Ottawa would be infringing upon the rights of the other three decision-makers if it assumed a more activist role.

A more impartial analysis might conclude instead, however, that this division of powers has been used by the federal government as an excuse for passivity in a field that is politically extremely sensitive.

Ottawa's timidity has created a policy vacuum — one which is now rapidly being filled by the three other decision-makers in the Canadian system. This position only decentralizes Canada's policy-making ability still further, thus making it increasingly difficult to implement effective and co-ordinated programs. And it also risks undermining the authority of the federal government permanently: power is addictive and will not willingly be surrendered by those who have appropriated it. Consequently, we can expect unco-ordinated policies — which, a priori, preclude decisions in Canada's best interest — and conflict as Ottawa strives to reassert its pre-eminence to continue pervading the Canadian system in the 1970's.

Internal conflict spells disaster

Let us look now at the outstanding example of domestic conflict in the field of energy today — oil policy — to see if any conclusions can be drawn on Canada's energy crisis.

The oil dispute involves the four main decision-makers previously mentioned although Ottawa, Alberta, and the oil industry are most heavily involved. This conflict blew up into a fullscale confrontation only last month when Macdonald surprised virtually everyone with his one-two combination of the extension of the InterProvincial Pipe Line to carry oil into Quebec and the imposition of a 40 cent per barrel surcharge on the export of Canadian crude. The last move, especially, angered Alberta premier Peter Lougheed who feared a loss of revenue from the province to the federal government. He reacted by stating that "we intend to fight back in every way we can against this detrimental and discriminatory federal Liberal policy".

The publicity accorded Alberta coupled with the oil industry's self-righteous indignation has obscured the fact that the conflict over oil policy can be traced to the start of this year. Until 1973, there had been a tacit agreement among all decision-makers on the preferred thrust of a Canadian oil policy. Put simply, that idea was to export as much as possible. Growing shortages of heating oil in the United States, followed by the progressive relaxation of the US import quotas (which had until then governed the entry of Canadian oil onto the American market) contributed to a huge (about 30 per cent) increase in exports last January.

Ironically, as the long-standing goal of unimpeded access to the US market was reached, a report, prepared by the National Energy Board NEB, entitled Potential Limitations to Canadian Petroleum Supplies, warned that, after 1973, Canada would no longer be able to supply the total (i.e., both export and domestic) demand for its oil. Indeed, dangerous indications of possible shortages in Canada itself were already evident; for example pipeline capacity had reached alarmingly high levels, threatening the security of supply should a mechanical breakdown or accident occur. During February, according to WEB member W. Stabback, refineries in Canada were assured "only by the skin of their teeth" that they would receive enough crude oil to last them the month.

As the shortage problem south of the border worsened, and schools and factories were forced to shut down, Canadian subsidiaries of American-owned multinational corporations refused to extend preferential treatment to the domestic market. In this time of potential shortages at home, the multinational corporation, operating under the free enterprise criterion of "economic rationality", made it quite clear that it would not hesitate to sacrifice the Canadian interest in favour of profit.

So Canadian government had little choice but to impose export controls on Canadian oil. Macdonald stated that such a policy was required to check the tendency of some subsidiaries of American firms "to be more concerned with shipping their feedstock to their US refineries first" without paying adequate consideration to domestic needs.

The unco-ordinated policies of two of the most important decision-makers, the multinational corporation, continentalist by definition, and the federal government, supposedly responsible for safeguarding the national interest had led to conflict. The executives of the industry accused Ottawa of a "flagrant breach of faith", while Lougheed, angered at not having been consulted, was 'hinting' that this is "the sort of thing which leads to confrontations".

Both industry's and Alberta's recriminations were partly justified since it appears that Ottawa had scarcely bothered to talk to anyone before imposing the controls. In fact, on January 11, Macdonald had declared in the House of Commons that "we are of the opinion that there is no danger to Canadian energy supplies, either oil or natural gas, arising from either the short run problem in the United States (sic) or on a longer-term basis". On February 15, scarcely a month later, Macdonald was announcing the export restrictions.

Ottawa's bold move in reasserting albeit belatedly and very reluctantly the national interest over the industry's and Alberta's short run policy of profit maximization had not, however, succeeded in harmonizing the energy policies of these three decision-makers. Taking advantage of a loophole in the export controls, the oil companies began shipping refined products, instead of crude oil, to the United States, in an attempt to circumvent the regulations. And, in March 1973, the export of gasoline was up by an incredible 740 per cent over March 1972. Faced once again with a crisis — some independent retailers were already shutting down due to a shortage of gasoline — the federal government was forced to impose restrictions in mid-June on the export of refined products also.

Meanwhile, it was becoming increasingly obvious to most observers that the justification for the retention of the Borden line (the Borden line divides Canada along the Ottawa Valley into two markets for oil: the western half is the preserve of Alberta crude while the eastern half imports oil from abroad) in the light of continuous OPEC (the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries) price increases was no longer valid. It would soon become cheaper to carry Alberta oil into Quebec and the Atlantic region rather than import it from the OPEC countries. (Many government critics insist that it would have been cheaper to do so a long time ago.) The logical solution was the extension of the InterProvincial Pipe Line into the Montreal market. This is precisely what Macdonald announced at the beginning of September, along with measures to "chill", not freeze, gasoline prices.

Once again, the reversal in policy was abrupt: the voluminous Green Paper on Energy, released only in June, had recommended against the abolition of the Borden line. Macdonald could have hardly anticipated the storm of protest which greeted his unexpected announcement. Quebec's Minister of Natural Resources, Gilles Masse, termed Macdonald's proposal "totally unacceptable". And the oil industry decried the price controls as "futile and misguided".

Still, there was more to come: barely nine days later, a 40 cent surcharge was imposed on Canadian exports of crude — thereby, incidentally, only bringing the price of Canadian oil to par with American oil sold in Chicago; in other words, our exports had been underpriced by 40 cents. This was the spark which set off the as yet unabated conflict with an angry explosion of charges and counter-charges.

Lougheed's reaction was as rapid as it was grossly exaggerated: "this appears to be the most discriminatory action ever taken by a federal government against a particular province in the entire history of Confederation". The hyperbole demonstrates well the West's — particularly Alberta's — current paranoia against "Eastern domination". (And the paranoia may be historically justifiable.)

September: crisis month

September was a long month as far as developments in the energy field were concerned. Towards the end of the month, two other crises arose:

First, Westcoast Transmission Co. of British Columbia announced a 10 per cent cutback in natural gas delivery due to production failures in two over-worked fields. If the expected shortages materialize, Macdonald has indicated that he would rather reduce gas supply to Canadian industry than cut off Westcoast's home users in the United States. It remains to be seen, however, whether this humanitarian approach will be accepted willingly by British Columbia if, as is most likely, factories have to shut down and workers are laid off.

With energy shortages looming in B.C., the situation in Ontario looks even more unsettled. First, in the light of the ever worsening crisis in the United States, some American oil companies have begun to divert the output of their Caribbean refineries from their traditional markets in Ontario to the US instead. Shortages of home heating oil this winter were barely averted and the National Energy Board was forced to draw up a hasty plan to deal with this emergency.

Secondly, it is still possible, although improbable, that Ontario will suffer a natural gas shortage this winter. The problem this time does not stem from any physical limitations to supply, as in the Westcoast case, but rather stems from a political constraint. Although once again highly complex issues are involved, the problem can be boiled down to Alberta's unwillingness to sell its gas to Ontario at present prices. If no compromise is forthcoming and its threat to place an embargo on deliveries, Ontario will have gas supplies this winter. Energy Minister Darcy McEwen indicated that the Hearn Election, now burning gas, may thereby significantly affect Toronto.

This is where matters now developments are now occurring predict with a fair degree more problems and further petroleum policy will arise.

Conflict expected in other Conflict is, of course, not policy alone. We can also confrontations in other fields:

- substantial opposition against a Mackenzie pipeline
- yesterday the federal its offer to the United States Washington state with Al super tankers out of the Energy policy affects US-Canada relations

To internal conflict must be juxtaposed the certain friction over energy policy which will develop between Canada and the US. Already forced to implement plans for fuel rationing, and with no prospect of rapid improvement in sight, the United States can scarcely be expected to accept with benevolence steps to cut back oil exports or any other "nationalistic" actions which the Canadian government may be forced to undertake.

"If we had not responded to fast-changing events, we would have been labelled...an inflexible government incapable of meeting challenges....If necessity again compresses our timetable, we would again have to act in the same way".

The Honourable Donald Macdonald, referring to the oil export tax. (As reported in the Toronto Star, September 29, 1973.)

Ottawa bumbles along

What conclusions can be drawn from the preceding analysis?

The first conclusion is that Ottawa does not have an energy policy and, as such, finds itself unable to cope with the fast pace of oil politics. The government is thus forced to react to crises as they arise and to content itself with often hasty and improvised solutions. The obvious question which we must ask is: how long will this approach continue to work before Canada is also faced with its own shortages?

A second observation, which stems directly from the first conclusion, is that the federal government is exhibiting a disturbing tendency towards treating the symptoms of the problem rather than the problem itself. As many of the above examples demonstrate, the federal government has been forced to impose controls after actions by the oil industry were seen to threaten the national interest. That multinational corporations usually operate according to their own inner logic rather than that of the host country is not a new finding. The leading question at hand, therefore, is: Is Ottawa's present policy of ad hoc solutions the best in the long run or would a more radical and once-and-for-all change — such as an increased public participation in the oil industry — be more effective?

Third, in its latest round of decisions concerning oil policy, Ottawa has shown a propensity to act suddenly, often reversing long-standing policies, and without consultation. Although the federal government's goals cannot be faulted (security of supply, reasonable prices, maximization of export revenues), the implementation of them inherently favoured the polarization of views. It is highly debatable whether the same policy objectives could not have been implemented as effectively with prior consultation of the principal parties involved.

"What a hell of a way to run a ballgame".

Ontario Energy Minister Darcy McKeough referring to Canada's history of non-policy in the national management of energy resources, in a speech to the Canadian Electrical Manufacturers Association, September 25, 1973.

Fourth, in all instances, confrontation rather than accommodation has seemed to characterize relations between the main decision-makers. Moreover, the positions of the parties involved have tended to polarize very quickly, making later bargaining and compromise more difficult to achieve.

It may be argued that a certain dynamic tension within a system will make for better decisions in the long run. However, to be effective, that tension must at all times be channelled in specific institutions which would then serve as "decompressors" of conflict. It is precisely these institutions which are lacking in the Canadian scene. In the Canadian policy vacuum, the decision-makers tend to operate independently of each other and, more often than not, at cross-purposes. Canada desperately needs not only a clearly-articulated energy policy but also a forum where tensions could be defused before they had the time to degenerate into conflict.

Lastly, the pernicious influence of the multinational corporation should be apparent to all. The oil industry is quite successfully following the maxim of "divide and conquer". The threat to back down from the Syncrude deal to develop the Alberta Tar Sands for example can only acerbate further the relations between Alberta and Ottawa. Indeed, Governing Council member and chairman of Imperial Oil, W.O. Twaits, expressed quite clearly the contempt which the oil industry must feel towards the petty squabbles. Referring to the latest dispute between Alberta and Ottawa, Twaits said the two governments "looked like a couple of pigs under a blanket fighting for the same acorn".

Does Canada suffer from an energy crisis? Indeed, it does. The country may suffer its first shortages this winter. And it's now torn apart by internal dissension. The consequence of continued paralysis from endemic conflict will be severe. The provincial governments and the multinational corporations are still diligently pursuing their strategy of short-run maximization of profits. Indeed, this disease has become contagious, as the federal government's advocacy of a Mackenzie Pipeline indicates. The United States, labouring under OPEC's sword of Damocles, has not yet rejected the concept of a continental energy pact.

Canada will not have to sign such a pact to share her energy resources with her southern neighbour. Present and future energy projects will see to that: the Columbia River Treaty, the Mackenzie Pipeline, the Nelson-Churchill diversion, James Bay, all constitute building blocks which will irrevocably tie the Canadian and American energy policies.

And when Canada loses permanently the ability to formulate its own energy policy . . .

Former patient testifies against Morgentaler

Associate Judge James Hugessen that her name or address not be published. She is an unmarried, twenty-six year-old foreign graduate student in the Montreal area.

She said that she contacted Morgentaler's office some time around the beginning of August, after finding out that she was pregnant. She first contacted Montreal area hospitals, after her gynecologist told her he did not perform abortions. His nurse suggested going to New York but the witness felt she had neither the time nor the money.

The nurse told her to contact Montreal hospitals but the four she contacted made unsatisfactory offers. The first two, the Catherine Booth and the Reddy Memorial, asked for what she described as "fantastic" sums.

The third, the Royal Victoria, could not give her a date that was soon enough and suggested that she contact Morgentaler. His clinic, she said, gave her an appointment for August 15.

The fourth hospital could not give her an appointment before the end of August. The witness said she told them she had an earlier appointment with Morgentaler, whom the person at the hospital in return described as "good".

On the day of the raid the witness, who was six weeks pregnant, arrived at the Beaugrand Street clinic shortly before noon. After talking with the doctor, the abortion was performed in a few moments and the witness was removed to the basement of the house to a recuperating room. At this time the Montreal police came in, arrested the doctor and removed all the patients to a police station.

There were ten patients at the clinic at the time. At the station eight were placed in a room downstairs while two of them, the only non-Caucasians, were brought upstairs and questioned. Later the same afternoon the patients were removed to the De Maisonneuve Hospital where they were examined by the head of the gynecology department.

After the examination the women were returned to the police station where the witness signed a statement describing the incidents leading up to the abortion and the abortion itself.

The doctor who examined the witness on the afternoon of the raid testified that she had had a miscarriage, either natural or otherwise.

The witness was returned to her home later that night. Two days later she suffered a complication and was brought to the Royal Victoria where she remained for a week. The abortion had not been completed.

Because of the sudden arrival of the police the witness did not have a chance to meet with the doctor after the abortion, either for an examination or to receive a prescription that Morgentaler said would have been given to her.

The woman said she needed an abortion because neither she nor the father-to-be could afford to support the child. She is a graduate student in agriculture while he is a student at Michigan State University. She also said she did not want the public shame that accompanies an unwed mother and illegitimate child.

Conference to discuss doctor

A three-day conference on women this weekend, sponsored by the Ontario Federation of Students and U of T's SAC, is to have a special session dealing with Dr. Henry Morgentaler's court case.

SAC organizers say the Saturday morning session might be attended by Dr. Morgentaler but organizers say they will not be sure until Friday.

The Friday night session, also open to men and women, will have Linda Jeness, American feminist-socialist and Trotskyist candidate for the 1972 U.S. presidency.

Other workshop sessions dealing with topics ranging from organizing on campus to women in oppressed nationalities will take place Saturday and Sunday and are to be open to women only.

Cody Hall will house the sessions of the entire conference.

MONTREAL (CUP) — A former patient has been the chief witness for the prosecution so far at the trial of Dr. Henry Morgentaler.

He is facing the first of six charges of performing illegal abortions.

The Crown is basing its case against Morgentaler on a specific abortion performed in his clinic August 15, the day the Montreal police raided the clinic and seized his files. Police also held for questioning all people that were in the clinic at that time.

From one of them they obtained a statement that she had received an abortion from the accused.

Her testimony has highlighted the first two days of the trial, October 18 and 19, and was expected to continue for some time when she resumed her testimony yesterday.

The witness, who is testifying under the Canada Evidence Act — giving her protection against prosecution on the basis of her testimony — also obtained an order from

NUS wants guaranteed wage for students

By DICK BROWN

If the National Union of Students (NUS) ever gets its way, students would have much of the financial burden of paying the university bills lifted from their shoulders.

A report on the financing of post-secondary education approved last weekend calls for a guaranteed annual wage for students and elimination of intra-provincial disparities in student subsidies.

"It is the responsibility of governments to ensure that all students have a fair and reasonable standard of living," the report says.

The report suggests a guaranteed annual wage for undergraduate and graduate students of $3,000 per year.

The undergraduate proposal would be for both part-time and full-time students plus tuition fees. The graduate student proposal would be "university-sector financing taking the form of graduate fellowships, MRC and NRC grants, scholarships and bursaries."

The NUS statement says the graduate funding of $3,000 per year would not include additional income from other sources, such as teaching assistantships.

The report criticises "tremendous regional disparity in the grant/loan proportions of student aid."

For example, the report points to Alberta where a student must borrow $3,500 before he can collect a grant, where in Ontario the first $800 is loan and the rest is grant.

Likewise, in Saskatchewan, the maximum assistance available is $1,900 per year, where in Alberta a student may receive up to $5,000 per year, the report says.

"We do not maintain that the Ontario student aid system is good, or even satisfactory," the NUS statement says. "In fact, we feel that an $800 loan ceiling is too high."

NUS calls for the federal government to "ensure that all provinces have at least as good a 'package' of financial assistance as Ontario," even though such assistance is generally a provincial responsibility.

The report says that the guaranteed student income plan is not extravagant, but it is "clear that this figure is not too far from the poverty line." It claims the figure is somewhat arbitrary, but adds: "It is not unreasonable to expect students to live at or below this level."

Stating that "the federal government supplies over one-half of the total costs of post-secondary education," the NUS report calls for the national student body to analyze the role of the federal government in education covering such points as whether the federal government should or should not be making direct grants to provinces, institutions or students.

"A strong federal presence in education is necessary," the report says.

However, the report does not agree with the current federal policy of taking money from the rich provinces and sending it to poorer ones.

"The amount of funds supplied to each province, on a per capita basis, should be increased to the amount given to the wealthiest provinces," the NUS report indicated.

The statement says it based its proposals on the idea that there "must be no financial or social barriers to the entry into post-secondary education," and that every student as well as any other member of society "has the right to an adequate standard of living."

The policy statement was carried a step further over the weekend as NUS passed a resolution calling for an annual tax deduction for students of up to $100 for books and study materials.

Sunday businessmen ignoring police warnings

By DICK BROWN

Metro Toronto police are having problems prosecuting businesses suspected of being open on Sunday in contravention of the Lord's Day Act.

In a report on file with the city clerk's office, police complain of provincial authorities refusing permission to prosecute more than 50 per cent of all cases, very low fines issued by judges when a conviction is registered and large time delays involved in prosecution.

The pre-World War 1 law stipulates that only stores selling "necessary" goods should be allowed open on Sundays. It recently has been under criticism, and some large grocery stores have opened their doors for business-as-usual on Sundays.

A letter from James Donald, an inspector at 13 division, to Deputy Police Chief George Dorkin, explains some of the police complaints.

It reads, in part:

"Each application to prosecute must be approved individually (by the provincial government). When the accused receives the summonses, he may then request remands at court and have all charges proceed on the same date.

"However, only one charge is heard and if a conviction is registered, all other charges are withdrawn."

Donald cited a recent example of the problems police are having.

"A conviction on a larger type of operation resulted in a fine of $10. On appeal, the charge was dismissed."

"The manager of this store was again charged, and, after having 19 adjournments in court, was fined $5. This involved numerous appearances by the officer who had laid this charge."

"Notice of appeal on this conviction has also been filed."

Donald observed: "Obviously an owner making a large profit on his operation is not fazed by the prospect of a small fine."

The file also contains a letter written by K.W. Schultz, an inspector at 11 division, to Harry Fielding, a police staff superintendent, outlining more problems police have in laying a charge.

"When summonses are applied for, all the information has to be sent to the inspector in charge of morality who forwards same to the Attorney General's Office (in Queen's Park) requesting permission to prosecute."

"The Attorney General's department is slow in authorizing the laying of charges and from information received from Inspector Wilson, authorization may be delayed beyond the statute of limitations."

In a separate letter in the file, Fielding complains:

"It is difficult to determine which type of business may be prosecuted."

"It is hard to explain to the local merchants why they are being prosecuted, when a precedent was set by Mac's Milk and Beckers in the past defying the Sunday closing laws."

In the past police have laid charges against whomever it is running the store at the time they enter. In some cases, a teenage employee was the only person around as the owner was not in on a Sunday.

The bureaucratic procedure of getting approval to prosecute from provincial authorities apparently has not been efficient as Deputy Chief John Ackroyd indicated in his letter that permission to prosecute has been refused in more than 50 per cent of the cases sent to the Attorney General's office.

Police also complain that even after a store owner has been charged, the store remains open until his case is heard in court, which when considered with the time delays in getting a prosecution approved and then sitting through the remands can be a period of some months. Even if a conviction is registered, some owners appeal it.

Schultz also indicates that the problems in prosecuting have been large enough that:

"Because of the general attitude of the public and ambiguity of the act itself, police action is only instituted after complaints have been received."

The scope of the problem was indicated by a second letter from Superintendent Henderson listing 62 stores in Scarborough, which in a one-year period from June, 1973 to June, 1973, had two or more violations each for which police requested permission to prosecute.

Henderson's letter did not indicate if permission was received.

Library strike settled at SGWU: 'administration caves in'

MONTREAL (CUP) — The five-week library strike at Sir George Williams University is over. Agreement in principle was reached on all outstanding issues at a negotiating session held Sunday evening. Final ratification is still about two weeks away.

"We're not exactly sure why the administration caved in after five weeks of strike action," said Michel Latulippe, a technical advisor from the CNTU.

"I guess the first comment was that all union members gave us complete support when we made our demands."

"The other reason is that professors and students were planning to boycott courses, because they need the library to do their work."

"The proposed boycott of courses made the big difference," said Nancy Marrelli. "The administration just didn't want this week to happen. When they found out what was going to happen this week, they began to negotiate seriously."

The union appears to be satisfied with wages in the new contract — all full-time library workers will be receiving at least $100 weekly in June 1974. As well, the administration has agreed to pay at least $100 gross in retroactivity. This applies even for employees who started working two days before the strike.

When asked why the administration did this, Latulippe said "the university saved at least $7,500 weekly while the strike was on, so this helped them give a bit more retroactive pay."

When asked why the university gave the library workers a reasonable salary offer, Latulippe said, "if they had any ideas about getting the union to lower its demands, they had to forget them when they found the library workers were prepared to fight for their demands."

Another important item in the new contract is that all new employees in Sir George libraries will have to become members of NUSGWUE from the beginning.

"This is a way for us to ensure the survival of the union," said Latulippe. "With the high rate of attrition we had in the past, there was always that danger we could lose our certification. But we don't have that problem any more."

The union is still waiting for a final text on employment security, but the two sides have agreed that employees in the bargaining group at the date of signing, will have employment security for the life of the contract.

"In this area, we feel that employees have been well-protected regarding transfers and seniority of employees in the bargaining group over others," said Latulippe.

Concerning overtime payment of salaries, the union originally asked to have a clause in the contract saying that employees could convert overtime to equivalent days off with the agreement of a supervisor.

On Sunday, however, the union deleted this demand from the contract after the membership said they could do without it.

Library employees who have to work during the Christmas - New Year's period will be paid two and a half times the regular rate.

Union members will be receiving three weeks of vacation after one year's employment, and four weeks after ten years. They have also been granted a floating holiday between January 15 and March 30, on a staggered basis.

The major gain the union made in this area is that they will be able to take their vacation between May 1 and September 30. If all employees want to have their vacation during that period, the university will have to give it to them. Employees who wish to have their vacation at another time, can do so with the agreement of a supervisor.

Agreement has also been reached on the question of employees taking a leave of absence without pay. A library worker who is away for less than six months will be guaranteed a job when he returns to work. An employee who stays away for more than six months, will have a job but not necessarily the same position. Union members will also have 15 days sick leave annually.

"We earned everything we got in this contract," said Marrelli. "None of it is a gift. We could have settled it weeks ago, but instead we had to struggle all the way."

Gays OK at city hall

Toronto City Council has scored a first in Canada by passing a resolution saying that city hall will not discriminate against gay people in its hiring policy.

The new policy climaxes a six-month drive by the Gay Alliance Toward Equality (GATE). GATE spokesmen say this is the first time in Canada any legislative body has recognised gay people as a minority which requires steps to ensure equal employment opportunity.

City hall, however, phrased the resolution in less straight-forward language, saying there shall not be discrimination "based on sexual orientation."

The vote was 15 to one in favor of the resolution, with only Alderman Paul Pickett voting against in the recorded vote.

Prior to its introduction in council, the resolution had received the endorsement of Locals 43 and 79 of CUPE, both of which represent city workers.

GATE spokesmen said afterwards they hope the resolution will be included in future union contracts negotiated with the city.

Dale Lieberman reports on intercollegiate women's tennis ... U of T had no trouble in winning the OWIAA tennis championships for the fifth consecutive year. The finals were held last weekend at York amidst the coldest and windiest days yet.

The biggest match of the tournament was a replay from last year when Toronto's Barb Brankovsky beat everyone except Anke Bronsels of York. This year was different as Brankovsky won easily. 6-2, 6-0, after losing the first two.

Final standings put Toronto first with 38 out of a possible 40 points. McMaster was second with 28 and York third with 16.

Brankovsky won first singles. Ulrika Bundesmann won second singles, and Sheila MacDonald and Susan Chow won second doubles. Wendy Stone and Ann Marie Crabbe took second in the first doubles.

More on injuries, excepted from Sports Illustrated... Dr. James A. Nicholas, the team physician of the Jets, who is best known for holding Joe Nameth's knees together, said a survey indicates that a 47 man squad in the NFL can expect 15 major injuries and five operations during a 20 game season. Noting that the average actual playing time in a game is about 80 seconds, Nicholas said this was the highest injury rate per unit time played in any sport.

Two more OUAA football records... Neil Lumsden of Ottawa scored 11 points against Waterloo last weekend to set 80 points as the new season mark with two games to go. John Wintermeyer's (Queen's) two field goals Saturday gave him a record fifteen for the year.

Volleyball starts, Vic and Erin lead soccer

Soccer by Chris Robinson

Erindale needed only a goal from 1:1 to shut out St. Mikes A in their pursuit of Vic. Meanwhile UC was proving that persistence pays as Treiser scored their first goal and they got their first point in a 1-1 tie with league-leading Vic (Regan cut them off at the pass for Vic's goal).

St. Mikes then ambushed UC 1-0 on a marker by Bulrin, but could only tie the Plumbers 0-0. The strikers' batting average was even worse than the Mets' last week.

Boyd and Saffery maintained Meds perfect record with unanswered tallies against New. The only other undefeated second division team went down when Jr Eng (Vevere, 2-Lam Moy) took PHE (Curtis 2, Ackley on a sideline pattern) 4-3.

Elsewhere in the second Trinity A sneaked by the hapless dentists 1-0 on a goal by Algie the mad loon caller. Herman for Law set off Margoin of St. Mikes B in a 1-1 saw-off.

In the third Knox is making a late play-off drive. Jess, McInnis, and Reid counted in a 3-0 bang of basement-dwelling Emmanuel. They sneaked by Architecture (Gardinyk, Carley) 3-2 with Forrester (2) and Chipangwi scoring. Forestry were the victims 2-1 as Blacktock and Reid counted against Gabrek.

In other action the leaders stayed there. Innis defaulted to Pharmacy while Grads (Farquharson 2, Duke of Earl) scraped by the foresters (Sarafyn of the toque and "fast break" Gabrek) 3-2. Yee notched a pair for the Eng III shutout of Architecture.

Lacrosse by Chris Robinson

Much has happened in the first division and no-one remains unbeaten. Erindale dry-gulched Vic 13-11 when Taillon tied on five, Geraghty and Sterritt struck for three each, and wily Wiley and subtle Sutherland each got one. The butler and the young man each served up five and Wardlaw legislated one in a losing cause. Erindale also took a gift default from Eng I and ripped Devonshire (Anderson 2, Huckstep 2) 9-4 on Tailoon (5), Sterritt (3-this is getting boring) and Pleschke. A determined SMC squad wrestled away a 5-5 tie after being down 5-2. Once again Sterritt (3), Forestry A player (skins) takes to the air to defend against a St. Mikes spike. Forestry won straight games.

interfac report

Geraghty and Wiley counted for green against the double blue Gilkison (2), Crupi (2), and Higgins.

In other first division action Vic (Butler 7, Young 3, Orlando, Dobbin, Phillips) vanquished Dev (Anderson 3, Tuff) 13-4. Eng I (Cruikshank 5, Lambert 4, Kurczyk 3, Audichuk) then whopped Vic (Butler 5) 13-5, after forfeiting to SMC.

Vic (Butler 5, Phillips 3, Young, Orlando) punched PHE (Browne 4, MacNeil 2) 10-6. The jocks then demolished Dev (Anderson, who else) 9-1 on scores by MacNeil (2), McGuey (2), Mehr (2), Yarekura, Browne, and Sullivan. They (Browne 3, McGuey, Sorbie) also smashed SMC (Gilkison) 5-1.

The jocks then shutout the Plumbers 7-0 by means of Bagg (2), Sorbie (2), MacNeil, McGuey, Browne. St. Mikes did win, (Gilkison 4, Crupi 4, Marchan 4, Feerick) 13-3 over the hapless Devs (Anderson 2, Manougian).

In second division action Scar (Smith 2, Bowyer 2, Cheng 2, Ho2) smacked Innis (Waller 4) 8-4, and shut out UC 6-0 from Smith (3), Cheng (2), and Ho. They also took a default from PHE B.

The second jocks (Halliwell 2, Taylor 2, Sullivan) inched Innis (Waller 2, Matsuba) 5-3. UC also took advantage of Innis (Compton) 4-1 on goals by Deckman (2), Gyongyossy, and Hurren.

Defending champs Knox have been having their troubles. For (Hosick 3) drew them (Bern 2, Pandy) 3-3 and Trin (Beatonoff 2, Storey) edged them (Bern 2) 3-2.

If you were able to follow all that you're doing better than I can. It looks like Vic, PHE and Erindale are the first division, while Scarborough and Trinity are the favorites in the second.

Volleyball by Bob Pritchard

The interfac volleyball season got under way last week with last year's division champions Eng I (Division I) and Scar (Division II) seeing action in the first two games.

Scar, who moved up to Div. I this year, maintained its winning ways by defeating Knox in two games straight, while Erin I bounced defending champ Eng I, taking two in a row from them.

In other Div. I play, Vic I defeated Dent A in two games, while Eng II shutout Music in their first game and then won the second 15-5. Meds took the first game from PHE A, only to have the Jocks come back to take the next two games and the match.

All 16 teams in Div. II played their season openers also last week. It was Erin II over Innis, Law over Vic II and Emmanuel over Wycliffe, in each case the winner taking two games in a row. St. Mike's won over Trinity in three games, while Dent B defaulted to Vic II. Pharm A lost their first game to For A, but managed to come back to win the next two games. Grad B and Pharm B defaulted to Grad A and For B respectively, and were withdrawn from the league.

Trinity and Law saw action again on Monday night. The first game was somewhat sloppy, with both teams just knocking the ball back and forth, but Trinity managed to come back from a 12-9 deficit to win 15-13. In the second game Trinity settled down to some proper blocking and spiking to take a 12-6 advantage. They almost blew their lead, letting Law close the gap to 12-10, but they hung on to win.

In another game, For A put down St. Mike's in two straight, with For relying on good defensive play to take the first game. In their second effort, the Foresters broke an 8-8 tie of a sluggish game, and with the help of some good serves by John Hawkins, got 7 points in a row to take the match.

Engineering won upset victory over league-leading Victoria by 13-5 route on Monday.

SAC takes results to Evans

By DICK BROWN

SAC president Bob Anderson personally took the results of last week's student referendum approving parity and representation on staffing decision to university president John Evans, but according to Anderson, Evans' reaction was to duck the issue.

Anderson said that Evans proposed the whole issue be taken up by the Academic Affairs Committee at its meeting November 6, a proposal which Anderson says he does not like.

"I think Evans was surprised at the size of the turnout and recognizes that students feel very strongly," Anderson said, "but he did not give any indication of what he thought about it."

"He did say he was not going make as extensive a comment about it as he had thought," Anderson said, adding that Evans did not say why his remarks were abbreviated.

About 6,300 students voted in last week's referendum with a two-to-one margin voting in favor of student parity on hiring, staffing and tenure committees, and about eight to one voting in favor of student representation on such committees.

Anderson said he does not approve of a body such as Academic Affairs deciding the "substantive issue" of parity because the Governing Council committee consists of about 50 per cent faculty and a student minority.

Anderson said SAC's next moves would be to consolidate its support mainly among the students, but also in other sectors of the university community.

However, he indicated: "There are no developed plans as that." Shortly after the referendum votes were counted last week, Anderson said: "It (the vote) gives SAC a mandate to proceed with the policy we developed."

Anderson said SAC has called a steering committee meeting for next Thursday evening to get into the questions of consolidating support and mapping strategy to the issue of parity out of Academic Affairs.

Anderson says he personally feels he would want to see the issue of student participation settled in a committee which has student parity.

The Forster task force on academic appointments, whose report released in August called for no student representation on staffing and tenure committees, will also appear in the Academic Affairs committee agenda at some future meeting.

Anderson said his discussion with Evans included the section of the Forster report which proposes a plan for dismissal of tenured staff for financial reasons.

"Both the provincial government and the administration seem anxious to have this contingency plan," Anderson said of Evans' comments. Anderson said Evans seems to feel the contingency plan is a crucial point for Evans and that the university president very much wants it implemented.

However, that worries Anderson who feels the existence of such a plan may be an excuse for the administration and province to institute across-the-board cutbacks in staff.

Anderson said there should be specific mechanism to deal with decline in student enrolments in various departments, such as the current decline in the classics department.

But such a mechanism should not be an excuse to fire staff to cut back a budget, Anderson said.

SAC passes budget: $377,710 radio Varsity catches flak

By BOB BETTISON

In one of the shortest budget meetings on record, SAC passed expenditures of $377,710 for this year's activities. Very few cuts were made, but Radio Varsity came under fire from council members for broadcasting Toronto Toros' games.

SAC campaigned against the university's decision to allow the Toros to use Varsity arena.

Council decided to pass the radio station's budget with a rider that it could be re-evaluated after January 31 when results of a services survey are known.

This was a compromise offered by president Bob Anderson to a motion by Vic SAC rep Rick Gregory which would have cut the station's budget in half.

Gregory called the station "an expensive toy. Little is done to communicate information or entertain the students."

Communications commissioner Geoff Parker said the SAC "is committed to running Radio Varsity this year." He added that a re-evaluation could be made next year but SAC should not "encroach upon their freedom in terms of running the station."

Station manager Roland Piesk said that the station is "serving a useful purpose". He claimed that the loyalty of the listeners was shown last summer when speakers broke down at Victoria college and students demanded that service be restored as soon as possible.

The station was further criticized for broadcasting Toronto Toros' games on Rogers cable in return for advertising income of $2,000 from the team.

Executive assistant Art Moses called the move "blatant support of profiteering mass commercial spectator sports." He said that SAC's policy has been to encourage participation and the operation of the Toros is "detrimental to the use of the arena by students and the community."

Vice-president Stephen Moses said approval of the $17,500 station budget should be contingent on not broadcasting the Toros games.

However the council passed the budget after an appeal by Anderson to allow Radio Varsity "time to prepare a defence." He said there should be time to make a study of the station's listenership before any decision on its future.

Services commissioner Seymour Kanowitch, who seconded the original motion to cut the budget, agreed, though he had "serious doubts that Radio Varsity is listened to by very many people."

The largest item in the budget was the executive commission with administrative expenses of $61,172 and executive expenses of $32,311, which includes executive salaries of $13,061 as well as $9,000 in OPS fees and $4,500 in NUS fees.

The only change made was to chop $1,000 from the proposed $5,700 for photo-copying and printing.

The next largest item, the budget for the Varsity of $39,395, was passed with minor changes proposed by Varsity Board of Directors representatives.

SAC is refusing to pay building maintenance and cleaning on the media building at 91 St. George because the university is not charging other organizations in university buildings such as the GSU and the Faculty Club.

Two controversial grants were passed after lengthy discussion to the Black Students Union and the Hart House Chorus. The chorus got $1,000 by a narrow margin of 12-10.

Gregory and Art Moses criticized the grant on the grounds that Hart House should be paying for its own activities. The chorus has been funded by SAC for a number of years but last year it merged with the Hart House Glee Club and receives $2,700 in Hart House funding.

Gregory said that Hart House is capable of funding the choir with its larger fee and SAC should not give the chorus any money.

Anderson said it was unfair to the chorus to "equate Hart House problems with the grant request." He added that SAC should investigate the Hart House decision making structures but this should not interfere with the chorus grant.

The campus centre levy of one dollar per student — or $22,263 — is being spent this year on the Erindale pub ($7,000) and architect fees ($5,000) with the rest being left for other campus centre related projects.

There has been little action taken by SAC for the last few years in implementing any kind of campus centre plans. In 1971 a SAC-sponsored report supported the creation of additional facilities without the construction of a single student centre comparable to others on Canadian university campuses.

SAC passed a grant to the Black Student Union of $1,400 for educational programs and maintaining cultural and service centre for the estimated 600 black students on campus.

Engineering SAC rep John Najbert moved that $2,000 be granted for what he called "an extremely worthwhile project". He said that the BSU should be supported to "further relations between black and white students on campus".

However finance commissioner Joe Redican said that "there is a limit to the amount of support that SAC can give." He added that the BSU should come back with more detailed plans on a proposed cultural exchange program and rallies.

The bitterness of past grants to the BSU was not present as council passed the $1,400 grant with the understanding that the BSU could probably get more funding later.

SAC passed the remainder of the budget intact with the education commission getting $25,227 the services commission $52,526 and the university commission $4,410. The communications commission, excluding The Varsity and Radio Varsity, was allotted $21,027.

The return to the wide-open grants policy of the Spencer - Dack administration of 1971-72 was evident as SAC made a number of grants to student groups and outside organizations. Education commission grants added up to $4,640 with services grants of $17,336 and grants of $7,000 to campus legal aid and $5,000 to the Student Health Organization of the U of T (SHOUT), which operates a community clinic in Alexandra Park.

Last year the more conservative Miglin administration cut back on handing out grants but ended up funding legal aid and the U of T chorus as well as a few other groups anyway.

Among the organizations receiving grants are the Young Socialists ($750), Grape Boycott Committee ($750), Spanish Club ($600), Gay Alliance Towards Equality ($200), St. Mike's Film Club ($700), Campus Co-operative Daycare ($2,000), Greek Students ($500), Laneway School ($200) and Urban Planning Conference ($400).

OAD defended

Student's Legal Aid Society, a campus group, has taken exception to recent Governing Council plans to have Ontario Alternate Distribution vacate its premises in the basement of the SAC building.

About two weeks ago, the Council decided that OAD's position as a commercial firm operating on campus land jeopardized the tax-exempt status of the SAC building as a non-profit establishment. Furthermore, OAD was doing business for both campus and off-campus groups.

In a letter to vice-president

Business Affairs Alex Rankin, the society charged that "favouritism" might be behind a decision that would rid the university of OAD while allowing a similar service, the University of Toronto Press, to stay.

"We hope that the decision of the Business Affairs Committee was a simple error and will soon be recognized as such. If it is in earnest, it can only be construed as political favouritism, a charge that would weigh heavily on the reputation of the University of Toronto."

socialist anthem passed by a substantial margin.

In the lighthearted debate one member noted that a precedent was set by SAC under president Steve Langdon in 1968-9 when they successfully demanded that the choir (then the U of T Chorus) sing at a Queen's Park demonstration.

Speaker Vince Del Buono commented that SAC "should have the occupation as soon as possible."

Hart House goes pink

The Hart House Chorus will have to sing the Communist Internationale at one concert on campus and one concert off campus as well as perform at any SAC or Arts and Science Student Union-sponsored occupation as a condition of receiving a $1,000 SAC grant.

The proviso was attached at Wednesday night's budget meeting on a motion by education commissioner Dave Galbraith. The vote to require the chorus to sing the international

City makes it easy to spot land deals

By ART MOSES

Toronto city council took the first step Wednesday toward compiling a useable index of property transactions.

If council proceeds along lines suggested by citizen groups the index could be a valuable tool in spotting land speculation and encroachments by developers on neighborhoods.

In the first move Wednesday, council asked chief planner Dennis Barker to report on a form of analysis and procedure for the regular publication of property transactions data.

Implicit in the request was a feeling that the data should be made public, and readily available for citizen's groups fighting developers.

But Marilyn Cox, who helped initiate the council move, fears some aldermen may balk at the publication idea after Barker reports. Cox is urban probe co-ordinator for Pollution Probe.

"This will be extremely valuable information to citizens groups and some alderman may not want them to have it," she said.

Probe subscribes to Teela Market Survey Reports, a real estate survey which catalogues land deals by the property and development industry.

Few community groups can afford the $2,000 Teela subscription fee and Probe asked council to take responsibility for providing the information.

"This is information the city should have," Cox said. "The city doesn't know what's going on in property transactions. It should be collecting the information for the public."

Property transaction are currently recorded with the city registry department on an address-by-address basis. The data isn't compiled by street or by neighborhood, making it incomprehensible without considerable work.

When the city tried to subscribe to the Teela survey, the company demanded a $1000 down payment, and insisted the information be kept secret. Teela is a private firm whose major clients are real estate agents.

City council also provided funds Wednesday for a study of land sales over the past 10 years. Cox said the historical material will "provide a context within which to judge current real estate data."

Available information has already been used by community groups to track down speculation and absentee landlords. It has acted as an "early-warning system" against blockbusting in stable neighborhoods.

Other groups have used the data for judging average property prices when acquiring sites for cooperative housing projects.

But until the city actually starts publishing it, Pollution Probe will continue its subscription to Teela.

"Probe will continue to get the information until we're damn sure the city will do what it says it'll do," Cox said.

NUS fuss over Kraft

The National Union of Students, while primarily a students' lobby at a national level by their own description, passed resolutions last weekend dealing with political issues outside the campus.

One resolution, moved by U of T, calls on NUS to provide at future national conferences hotel accommodations which are not owned by International Telephone and Telegraph (ITT), the American communications conglomerate active in events in Chile which were opposed to the late president Salvador Allende.

That resolution also called for the Canadian government to provide asylum status for students from Chile and no student fees be levied against Chilean students now in Canadian universities.

Closer to home, another resolution calls for NUS to "encourage" its members to boycott non-union grapes, Dare cookies, products produced by the Kraft company, Angolan coffee, and wine from Portugal and South Africa.

PECU says it's back at square one

Howie Stein, chairman of the Political Economy Course Union, walked out of his meeting with department chairman J.S. Dupre, and shrugged: "Well, it looks like we're back to square one."

During the meeting Dupre had told Stein there would be no students on departmental hiring and tenure committees as well as no student participation in the selection of a new department chairman next year.

"As long as I'm chairman, there will be no students on departmental committees," Stein quoted Dupre as saying.

Dupre was chosen department chairman in 1969 without student participation which created an uproar among political economy students in the department.

Students in PECU refused to admit the legitimacy of Dupre's chairmanship for a period of time following his selection by faculty, Stein said, predicting it could all happen again.

The question of student participation came up during a discussion between PECU representatives and senior departmental officials over section changes and quality of teaching.

Stein said in some courses students are changing sections out of ones held by poorer instructors into sections by better ones, causing an overcrowding situation.

While Stein said part of the meeting was disappointing, other parts he was happy with. In ECO 100, he said a committee was struck consisting of students who had the course last year, students currently taking the course and faculty members, to work on the problems of large class sizes.

While the committee could be helpful, Stein said, he was "not satisfied" that the department gave no commitment to have tutorials in the course. He said this would help alleviate the problems of large class size.

On the other hand, he said he is happy the department is planning tutorials for ECO 200 and 202 next year which will help the problem of class size.

One issue which rankled Stein was the overflows in COM 100. He said more than 200 persons were turned down for this course after it filled this fall. While the department eventually added two sections, he said no one had kept track of who had been turned down and the people wanting the course had no way of knowing there were openings again.

The two new sections have low enrolment as a result, he said.

While Stein expressed approval with such progress as the PECU committee made in the meeting, he said it was clear the department was not going to hand over any power to students or go along with any proposal which would do so.

UFW leaders work for co-operation

TORONTO (CUP) — In the 1930's John Steinbeck championed the farm worker's cause in the classic novel "Grapes of Wrath". On streets today throughout Toronto, 31 Californian farm workers are doing the same thing.

They are seeking Toronto's co-operation in their current grape boycott. Toronto is the third-largest consumer of grapes among North American cities for per capita consumption.

"We are here to stop the sale of table grapes because this is the only way we can win our contracts back," said Miguel Contreras, a United Farm Workers spokesman.

The contracts refer to a two-year strike that ended in 1970. They provided for a pay increase from $1.90 to $2.20 per hour as well as better working conditions, for the first time toilet facilities and drinking water were provided on the fields and the use of pesticides were controlled.

"For the first time we felt respect. Our job had some dignity and we weren't being treated like dirt," said Contreras.

Last April 15 those contracts expired and the California grape growers lowered the wages back down to $1.90 and removed the sanitation facilities. On April 16 a strike against these moves involving 25,000 farm workers began. But the strike was met by manipulative tactics, of the growers. They used what Contreras called "political influence, vigilante in order to minimize the strike's effectiveness."

Injunctions were ordered by area judges requiring strikers to remain one hundred feet apart while on picket lines. Over six thousand workers were arrested for violation of this rule. The growers smuggled in thousands of Mexicans to do the harvesting and employed motorcycle gangs from the San Francisco area to protect their interests.

These events which hardly seem possible today explain why the farm workers have turned to a mass boycott as a means of settlement. Contreras believes that farm workers are being exploited throughout the world as a direct result of poor education and lack of organization. He admits that his prime concern is the California region "however after our union starts growing we will expand into all areas of the US and perhaps into Canada," he said.

Contreras is optimistic about the effectiveness of this most recent boycott. "Hopefully it will end in about seven months he said.

The United Farm Workers already have the support of the Catholic, Anglican United and Unitarian churches throughout Toronto. Speeches will be made by UFW workers in various churches throughout the city. On November 3 the unions founder, Cesar Chavez will be speaking at Massey Hall.

Contreras hopes the public doesn't misinterpret the workers' demands "We are not asking for a lot of money, just the $2.20 and the better working conditions," he said.

The boycott is being used throughout North America, as the California farm workers are planning on visiting 63 major cities.

40 protest Ontario trade mission to South Africa

By LIZ MORRISON

About 40 people attended a demonstration yesterday to protest the decision of the Ontario government to send a seven-man trade delegation to South Africa next Wednesday.

NDP leader Stephen Lewis told the group of demonstrators that earlier that afternoon Premier Davis had met with the government's committee to reconsider sending the trade mission but had decided to go ahead with plans to send it "despite public protest and the press."

"The trouble is," Lewis said, that "nobody in the cabinet understands the issues involved: what is taking place in South Africa and what makes it a totalitarian state of the worst kind. They (the cabinet) have no comprehension of third world reality."

Lewis felt that the profit motive was of prime importance for the government. "The Tories are making dollars and they don't care about the human issues," he added.

Lewis said that Davis would not identify the eight firms taking part in the trade mission, only that they were involved with "non-military" materials.

Ontario Federation of Labour official John Eileen condemned the decision and said that it is appalling that the Ontario government would

"flout the position of the United Nations' sanction against trade with this racist regime."

"Labour has traditionally supported trade because trade provides jobs", Eileen said. "However, as long as the white minority government in South Africa continues its brutal apartheid policy . . . The people of Ontario would rather starve than support trade with such a government or buy its goods."

Don Taylor, of the United Steel Workers of Canada said that the Ontario government wants a "piece of the action" and is willing to exploit the South African cheap labour policy to get it.

The government's policy is "cynical, hypocritical and reprehensible," Taylor said. "Basic civil and human rights must be recognised by the South African government before any Canadian trade mission is sent," he added.

Four representatives of the groups present then went to speak with the Premier. Demonstration co-ordinator Joe Saloojee was not optimistic about their success but repeated how important it was to continue protests and to try and deter the government. He hoped that the demonstration had gained the support of discontented South Africans in Canada and interested Canadians.

The demonstration was orderly and the protesters carried placards with slogans such as: "Ontario trade supports massacre and repression" and "trade with South Africa; trade with racism." There were no incidents.

The demonstration was called by the African National Congress, the National Association of South Africans in Canada and the Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Portugal's African colonies. There were also representatives from Voice of Women, the National Black Coalition of Canada and the United Nations Association of Canada.

Ontario government officials have said the trade mission will primarily be going after consumer goods rather than capital equipment.

The Davis shopping list includes such items as automotive parts, fishing lines, farm machinery and wallpaper.

During a stormy debate in the provincial legislature, Claude Bennett, minister of Industry and Tourism, defended the trade missions saying that the government "sends trade missions where we think there is economic advantage to this country and this province."

We are principally concerned about how we can advance the cause of Ontario."

Protests, however, started mounting quickly from such groups as Oxfam and the TWCA.

So what's all this fuss about Friday, anyways? Festively filling-in on these fibrous fossils for your fervent fascination or fastidious frustration were: Randy Robertson, Art Moses (without the commandments), Heather Sanguins, Ruminous Bob Bellison, Liz Morrison, Don Gruckshank, Gilda Oran, Ellen Yakamolo and welcome back to Igor

The Varsity is a member of Canadian University Press was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Daxons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors 91 St. George St.

For whom does university exist?

After years of watching a secretive, elitist faculty make decisions regarding education quality without conferring with the recipients of that education, the students of this university have taken the chance to speak, and the results were telling. A majority of those who voted, and one might assume that those who didn't are not interested in their education, said that they wanted equal representation with faculty on hiring and staffing committees.

Simple enough. The facts are there. Now, what should be the results? The situation among the faculty is probably well known — we've been hammering it at you since the beginning of the year. The faculty is divided on even student representation on these committees and it's probable most wouldn't touch the idea of parity. Frankly, we're a little tired of reporting the tired words of people like Bill Nelson, Keith Yates and Don Ivey, who would see this structure of no student input remain. Their elitism is amazingly short-sighted and in time will do this university great damage.

This university must be, above all, a place for teaching, a place for the student, not a retirement home for aging academics. The faculty insistence that the students have not the qualifications to involve themselves in directing their education is nothing less than an insult to the student intelligence that the faculty claims they are trying to improve. That is an insult that every student on this campus should take personally.

Decisions are made daily that involve the quality of our education: Staff are hired or fired, courses are added or dropped from the calendar, all without the smallest amount of student voice. This total lack of responsibility on the part of the faculty, this assumption that the students do not care or have the right to care, this assumption that only the faculty knows what is best is a little frightening. The denial of tenure to three math teachers who have nothing but good reviews from their students gives a fair indication of how far the elite is willing to go in order to ensure that their idea of a good education takes precedence over anything as unimportant as a student's opinion. These sorts of decisions without recriminations have to stop.

In order to deal with a faculty that holds an opinion that we at The Varsity feel is detrimental to student interest, the demand for student opinion on staffing committees must take the form of a demand for parity on these bodies. This university exists for the student, not for research-mongers and the only way to insure that this is so is to ensure that teaching is a primary consideration in tenure decisions. We are being taught, they must come to us for decisions. Only we know what goes on in the classroom.

So, SAC asked a few questions and they were answered as most expected. Because it was the expected answer, nobody is too excited about the future. Dr. John Evans is being close-mouthed, as if the matter does not rate comment, (so the natives are restless, what else is new?)

SAC president Anderson stated after the vote that "SAC now has a mandate". So, we want to know what he is going to do with it. SAC seems almost as bored with the answers as Dr. John. They say that at the present time they are involved in "consolidating their support". If last week's results weren't support, we're at a loss to know what is. Dr. John has offered a committee to look into the problem (a revolutionary new approach), and Smiling Bob Anderson is still smiling.

SAC has to move quickly if it wishes to keep the support it already has. SAC has a mandate, that's sure, but if they don't move on it, there's going to be another long, sleepy period, one from which the students may never waken. The way we see it, SAC has no choice, with all this support, but to take this matter and fight it all the way to the provincial government. If they back down or even slow down, they will lose any support they ever had.

SAC can't do it alone. The students hold the power, SAC only represents them. Students have used various methods in the past to back up demands, most have met

Tom McLaughlin

Three years ago, a student strike failed by 54 votes, the first to be even considered since 1885. A total student boycott of classes and events is the most powerful weapon we have, and it's interesting to note that three years ago, in the midst of a lot of political trouble, the only one that failed. There's the feeling that things are a lot quieter than three years ago, but we think people are kidding each other. Where are all those radicals of yester-year? Replaced by others who are just sharpening their teeth.

This place exists for us, without us it is a sham. We have the right to decisions. The most effective way to ensure this right is to remove ourselves (and our money), until such time as there is a meeting on our terms. The only way SAC can save itself from oblivion is to endorse a strike vote.

Ivey editorial missed a point

Although the Varsity's attack on New College principal Donald Ivey Monday may have bordered on the intemperate the object of the venom is not at all undeserving. In fact you missed a crucial point.

It was Donald Ivey — brother-in-law to then Colleges and Universities Minister John White — who in July 1971 ultimately convinced the Minister to withdraw his proposal for equal student/faculty representation on the new U of T Governing Council then being debated by a legislative committee. Ivey's persuasive powers wrapped up a most hysterical campaign by U of T faculty members against White's party plan. White admitted that it was Ivey who was most crucial in changing his mind, and in settling for a plurality of faculty over students. Who said Ontario's Tories don't operate through family connections...

Ivey may pooh-pooh the referendum results but the fact remains that the first time equal faculty/student representation has been put to a cross-campus referendum, and the first time students have ever been asked if they wanted representation on staffing bodies, the answer was a resounding "yes". Ivey should look especially closely at the results in professional faculties and at the poll in his own New College.

Simcoe Hall "hypocritical"

The Simcoe Hall policy of expropriating New Hogtown Press and Better Read Graphics is indeed hypocritical.

The Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Portugal's African Colonies, a non-profit educational and liberation support group, having had good working relations with Hogtown and Better Read, knows the true situation. Suggestions of "any excessive payment of salaries" to workers at Better Read is slanderous. Not only do they offer rates well below standard commercial printing rates, but for local community groups such as TLCAP they do not even charge for labor.

The workers at Better Read often work long hours at no extra pay to get out rush printing jobs. They do not demonstrate a desire for profit. In fact, it is just the opposite. They are dedicated to genuine educational work, and support such work in a solid, self-sacrificing manner.

We cannot help but be suspicious of the motives of a university administration which uses such obviously falsely construed charges as municipal taxation to oust educational groups such as Hogtown and Better Read, but which does nothing to get rid of commercial caterers who make a profit by underpaying their workers.

Yates says Varsity "unfair"

I had not intended to write to The Varsity on the following subject until I read Professor Corbett's letter (October 22nd) praising The Varsity's coverage of the current debate concerning the composition of tenure committees and related matters.

Although The Varsity reported quite accurately the substance of my remarks during the debate at Trinity College, Monday October 15th, it did not publish this report until Friday October 19th (after the recent referendum had taken place), although it gave prominent coverage in its Wednesday edition to another debate on a related subject which also took place on the same night. (A Varsity reporter was in fact present at the Trinity debate).

It is also curious that when The Varsity finally did see fit to publish a commentary on the Trinity debate, it apparently did not consider it important to record the results of the debate: The motion before the house was "that students are the best judges of their professor's teaching ability". For the record, this motion was soundly defeated in a vote on the debate itself, and a subsequent vote on the spirit of the motion was also defeated.

I think this information will be of interest to many students, and feel that it would have been fairer reporting to have included it in the Wednesday October 17th edition. I trust you will publish this letter in the next edition of your newspaper.

NDP heading for PQ alliance

By WAYNE ROBERTS

The NDP may be making an electoral alliance with the P.Q. if the forecasts of Waterloo University political scientist John Wilson are accurate. He was speaking at the third NDP-sponsored meeting on "Liberty and equality on the topic of Identifying New Democrats". Wilson argued that the PQ alliance may be the only way the NDP can overcome its inability to get to Ottawa on the basis of class politics.

Several public opinion studies carried out by the Party showed NDP voters west of the Ottawa river were distinguished by marginally higher class awareness and sympathies, he argued. Apart from age (New Democrats are disproportionately younger) and sex (New Democrats are 66% male), "New Democrats aren't very odd", he stated.

"The only difference of any consequence" he said, is the tendency to see class-related issues as more important than corruption, maple leaves and leaders. In Manitoba, he said, the perceptions of class are the governing perceptions of the political system. "That's why we win", he said.

"But we can't go east of the Ottawa on the basis of class perceptions", he argued, because low class polarizations there mirror the low level of social and political development.

In Quebec, this means that the NDP must form an alliance with the PQ, the only party that captures the kind of sentiments the NDP is trying to tap. He dismissed the PQ's separatism as unimportant. Less than half their supporters are actual separatists and the PQ would have to carry a referendum anyway, he stated. Their budget, he argued, was a carbon copy of the Ontario NDP program.

Debate in the session focussed on the orientation to political victories in the west to the exclusion of the "underdeveloped" Maritimes. Wilson firmly rebutted any arguments geared to raising the political consciousness of Easterners. We will come to Ottawa "in the fullness of time", he said. We have to wait for the political and social system of the Maritimes to develop before we can make any headway there, he concluded.

(Ed.-Yates' article was deleted for space reasons, believe it or not, just as we didn't print his letter immediately because of a backlog of letters.)

SMC-Vic letter was biased

The October 24th issue of The Varsity contained what is in many ways a surprising apology for Zionism, signed by ten staff members from St. Michael's College and Victoria University, in an attempt to commit Christendom to the support of the Zionist cause. The argument runs to the effect that, since the Christian World has been guilty of crimes against the Jews, it is therefore obligated to support Zionism willy-nilly, to the utter disregard of the wrongs done in the process to the Arabs, the original innocent bystanders. This apology is surprising in view of the wide spread acceptance in Christendom of the Zionist mythology that claims, on the basis of ancient occupation and religious veneration, the right to Palestine that negates the rights of the Arabs who had lived there for thirteen hundred years and more. It is all the more surprising in view of the bad press that the Arabs generally get in Western Christendom. A fact inherited from long centuries of fear and hatred begotten of its long conflict with the Muslim World.

Anti-semitism cannot be condoned when the Jews are its victims, any more than can any other form of race, colour or religious prejudice. The article in question, however, is rife with prejudice, often subtle, but nonetheless virulent: anti-semitic prejudice against the Arabs (for they too are Semites and cousins of the Jews). The demand that we "affirm Israel as the visible manifestation of both Jewish survival and security", while at the same time denying Arab rights by omission or glossing them over, is clear evidence of bias. It is the perpetuation of the denial of Arab rights implicit in the Balfour Declaration and subsequently confessed to by Lord Balfour himself — that there never was any intention of safeguarding the rights of the "non-Jewish" majority of ninety percent. This denial of Arab rights was repeated in the United Nations vote on the partition plan on November 29, 1947, while refusing the right of self-determination or even consultation to the Palestinians. Should Christendom not feel some guilt at this denial of rights that gave rise to the Palestinian diaspora, with all of the attendant suffering and festering hate?

The importance of the spurious protocols of Zionism for the opponents of Zionism is greatly exaggerated, not only for thoughtful people in Christendom, but also and especially in the Arab World. Any first-hand knowledge of the Arabic press and literature will reveal that they are not "presently in widespread circulation in the Arab-Islami World", nor are they "definitely a factor in the Middle East struggle".

It is obvious bias to accuse the Arabs of wanting to perpetrate "a second Auschwitz" on the Jews. The Arabs have never had a first Auschwitz — that was an aberration of Western Christendom, and the learned signatories of the article should have known that historically the Jews have been much better treated by the Muslim Arabs than by Christian Europe. If the Voice of the Arabs radio station, run by the Palestinian Liberation Organization in Cairo, threatened in 1967 to "drive the Israelis into the sea", no responsible Arab leader since that date has repeated such threats. Security Council resolution No. 242, of November 22, 1967, accepted by Egypt and most of the Arab States, far from seeking to dismantle Israel, affirms her right to "secure borders". Bias further shows itself in the attempt to smear Christian sympathy for the Palestinian refugees with the Marxist brush of Third World ideology and what may be taken by implication as the sentiment of fellow-travelling liberals. It is mere obfuscation of the issue to claim that Christian opinion is seeking solace in the guilt of the Jews with regard to the Palestinian refugees, ought she herself not to face it? — which she has consistently refused to do to date. No accusation of Arab "indifference to the refugees" can obviate this fact. Somewhere along the line, if peace is ever to be attained, the wishes and rights of the refugees must be consulted.

Luckily the signers of the article do not speak for the whole of the Christian Church. The World Council of Churches, in a meeting on the Island of Cyprus following the June War of 1967, issued a declaration concerning the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force. The Christian Church may not be guiltless with regard to Christendom's past treatment of the Jews; but, if this is to keep her from mediating between Arabs and Jews, who in the world has the required clean hands to take up the task? Neither the Church, nor the United Nations, nor the Great Powers, nor the combatants themselves, have clean hands; but this must not prevent one and all from working to bring peace to this cruelly war-torn area.

Victim on trial, not accused

By HEATHER SANGUINS

A rape victim's troubles "begin after the rape" when police deal with the victim in disbelief or amusement and the courts go into the victim's sex life in detail.

This was the view presented by Jo Atkinson, a U of T history student delivering a lecture Wednesday night at OCE.

Atkinson said that once a rape trial begins "the victim is more on trial than the accused." She said the aim of this court room tactic is to try to prove promiscuity and hence enticement on the part of the victim, which in some cases can get a not guilty finding for the accused.

Atkinson recited a list of common stereotypes about rape and then put them to rest:

• the rapist is sexually repressed — actually most rapists are married or have readily available sexual outlets like girlfriends;

• a real man cannot control himself — one study of 700 Philadelphia rapes proved that 90 percent of the gang rapes were planned;

• the victim was provocatively dressed — a questionable premise in view of the number of geriatric, pregnant, and under-the-covers-in-bed victims;

• 'bad girls' get raped — in a Washington, DC, study 82 per cent of the victims were "nice girls," although the study failed to define what it meant by 'nice'.

Atkinson emphasized that rape is not as much a sexual crime as it is one of violence: an expression of sexual politics, i.e. in that it is power-related.

Most rapists are not interested in compliant sex. She cited the paradox of the increase in violence during gang rapes which should require less violence because of the increased number of attackers.

Atkinson suggested that to prevent rape women should take courses in self-defense, such as the one offered at the Benson Building, and that they physically strengthen themselves, for instance through working out at a gym. Her main point was that women should stop thinking of themselves as victims, i.e. as passive and ineffectual.

The speaker urged the audience to report to the police any rape that happened because, if nothing else, it adds to the statistics.

She also said that a victim's being hysterical in the police station is a doubly good idea as it relieves some of her feelings and also it helps to convince the police that a crime has occurred.

Atkinson stated that in the past rape has been treated from the rapist's end of the situation, that he "needed psychiatric help", but that from 1969 on it has been considered from the victim's point of view — no longer is it assumed that she should hide from it.

Instead, media coverage is about the victim's story of the rape, how the victim was treated by the police, and her subsequent self-view.

Atkinson said that consequent to this charge rape is being given more and serious consideration from a sociological cause-and-effect standpoint. She demanded an end to the socialization of women as being "helpless victims."

One anecdote, cited by the speaker, occurred in the Israeli parliament when they were considering a serious rise in the number of rapes. Replying to one member's suggestion that a curfew be imposed upon women Premier Golda Meir retorted that it was men who should be curfewed as they were committing the rapes.

Atkinson reminded the audience that the subject of rape is only beginning to be investigated and that her ideas are "very tentative". She stated that there are some things that are known about it.

It is the "most frequently committed crime of violence and also the least frequently reported crime."

Questioning the source of their information, she quoted two estimates of the ratio of unreported rapes as being 1 to 10 (FBI) and 1 to 3.

Atkinson herself would only say that there were "far more" committed than were reported. The speaker pointed out that comparatively "fewer cases are solved, and fewer convictions are received."

From worker government relations the Liberal party's record remains

Voters in Québec go to the polls Monday to decide what is likely to be an election of some historical importance. In past Varsity issues we have examined, through translations from Québec-Press, the Union Nationale and Créditiste parties. We also had a look at some of the Liberal party's faults with respect to language and James Bay. Today we reveal Liberal policy in two other important areas — labour relations and economic development. And while there are other issues in this election — cultural and constitutional affairs, agricultural policy, and consumer protection, for example — the following two are perhaps two of the most important — issues which have been central to the struggle for independence in Québec. We begin by examining the labour situation in Québec and follow this up with an interview on economic development policy with Parti Québécois critic Guy Joron.

By LOUIS FOURNIER
adapted from Québec-Press

No Québec government since the days of the Duplessis regime has been more anti-labour than the present Liberal government.

Although the Liberal government has presented a very weak front before the multinational companies, Anglophones, the rich, and "big brother" in Ottawa, it has shown considerable strength when facing the workers and their trade unions.

ions. And when the party can't put the owners in their place (they don't even try to) they give "lessons" to the union, (to use Robert Bourassa's expression).

The pros and cons of Liberal labour policy over the past three and one-half years isn't difficult to evaluate. The party has done all it could to provoke the workers in order to "break" them and destroy the worker's movement. In this policy area, as in many others, Bourassa hasn't succeeded in constructing anything at all.

But that's not the end of it... In its official program the Liberal party wishes to go even further in the way of repression and destruction. Furthermore, it intends to have the state intervene in the management of industry to tame the unions and their members.

The Liberal record over the past term hasn't been very positive. Some of the measures included:

- breaking a strike of more than 200,000 workers in the public service,
 - jailing dozens of union militants and the presidents of the three largest unions in Québec,
 - complacently letting the strike-breakers do their dirty work,
 - multiplying injunctions which changed the rules of the game in mid-stream.
- And now the Liberal party is annoyed because the unions want to vote it out of office.

The Liberals are only too willing to suppress the unions

According to Robert Burns, Parti

Québécois member of the National Assembly from Maisonneuve riding, the Liberals have done absolutely nothing positive in the way of labour relations over the past few years. And when they in fact did pass any laws, they were laws against the workers. "The Liberal party is the enemy of the working class", according to Burns.

"The worst measure was Bill 19, the bill that broke the legal strike of 200,000 employees of the public service in the spring of 1972. The Liberals systematically provoked the workers, didn't negotiate with them about essential services, threw up injunctions against them, and then proceeded to explain them after the fact. And I wasn't astonished by what followed: spontaneous strikes, occupations. That's normal. They had just imprisoned the presidents of three unions — another foolish mistake!

The anti-labour bills

"Before that there was Bill 38, sort of a Bill 19 for construction workers. As usual, the government let the situation get worse. Then, when public opinion began to become bothersome and when violence began, the government intervened — brutally.

"But still on the topic of construction, with Bill 9 the government changed the rules of the game right in the middle. It also sanctioned the Centrale des syndicats démocratiques (CSD) beyond all the rules. Worse still, it dared to present a repulsive law, Bill 89, to abolish or almost abolish, the right to strike in the public services.

"What Québec really needs is a law to define the essential services in case of strikes, for example between Hydro-Québec and the hospitals. But Bill 89 is a law which quite simply lifts all right to strike in the public services. In the PQ we intend to carefully work out such a law along with the workers. And I know that the unions agree with us on such services so as not to deprive the people of electricity or the sick of the essential needs during a strike in the public services. The Bourassa government also realizes this but it has preferred to provoke the unions and make everyone afraid."

Hydro-Québec

We then asked Burns why the PQ had voted, like all other parties in the National Assembly for Bill 73 which brought on the strike of the Hydro-Québec employees. He was slightly embarrassed in answering: "We tried to limit the damage and to lessen the effects of Bill 73. But that law had to assure that the essential services were available; however we went on record that the law was not created to break a strike..."

Burns then continued with his analysis of the Bourassa regime:

"The government which passed a series of laws against the workers has not really added any laws in the group's favour. They haven't carried out any amendments to the workers' code for three and one-half years. They frequently asked for injunctions. They did nothing to prevent the obvious illegal actions of strike breakers — a real provocation. We have to adopt an anti-scab law as soon as possible and if labour minister Cournoyer speaks about such a law today it's because he was tossed into a corner by 400 strikers in his office at the end of

"Cournoyer has no long term political plans regarding working relations. And when the Liberals have a political program that's a little bit clearer, as in their official program, they interfere with the internal plans of the unions. For example, they wish to severely regulate strike votes, which wouldn't be valid unless two-thirds of the workers were in favour of going out on strike; and they want to give the justice minister the powers to intercede into all private conflicts.

"There is a score of other areas where the Liberals haven't done anything to meet the urgent problems. So one is always waiting for some significant reform of the workmen's accident commission, which at the present time, gives ridiculous compensation. We are also waiting for a law dealing with negotiation by job, a real political statement on payment for work done, and the professional organization (we are still organizing bricklayers, a profession on the way to extinction!) We are waiting for severe action against the private placement centres like Manpower, which exploit the workers, and so on..."

The action that I find the most dangerous is the willingness of the Liberals to tame the unions. They stick their noses everywhere where it's none of their business, and leave without a solution problems that they should be making their business.

By LOUIS FOURNIER

"One can't really reproach the Liberals for what's happened to Québec, the bad measures as well as the rare good ones, because they really weren't involved in any of them! They chose not to intervene in the functioning of the economy! They left that task to others—private enterprise, Ottawa, and Washington!"

That sums up the three and one-half years of the "political economy" of Bourassa's Liberal government, according to the PQ deputy for Gouin riding, Guy Joron, financial critic for the Parti Québécois in the National Assembly.

"The Liberals don't want to intervene," he said, "because that's their political philosophy. And they cannot intervene because they don't have the means to, and don't want to obtain the means. One of these measures—the first of all—is independence for Québec. The Québecois government has no room to manoeuvre within Confederation. Bourassa himself admits this when he says that on all sides and on all occasions his maneuvering space is slight. That's for sure: the real powers lie elsewhere."

Guy Joron, a 33-year old ex-stock broker, joined the Parti Québécois and was elected in 1970 as a deputy of the semi-working-class riding of Gouin in Montréal. He is one of the architects of the PQ's economic program and Québec-Press asked him to analyse the pros and cons of the Bourassa government with respect to economic development.

"Bou Bou" Bourassa finds Québec workers a pain in the neck

... to economic development dismally poor nuclear energy plan. Then all the developed countries of the world approached us. He preferred to make "electoralism out of electricity".

He even went so far as to talk about the tourist resources of James Bay. The minister of natural resources, Massé, also told me in the National Assembly that divers could undertake mineral exploration in the flooded territory of James Bay.

Superport

Another example is the famous super-tanker port in the lower St. Lawrence River. Bourassa announced it as if it had already been completed while the preliminary studies had then hardly begun. Worse yet, we learned that it was the companies interested in the project that had themselves made the ecological studies—an investigation to discover whether the environment would be threatened by the superport. You can be sure that these companies will decide that there's no danger!

G.P.: Are there more complete studies?
G.J.: There are at least two dossiers that the Bourassa government refuses to disclose: the cost of federalism for Québec and a study on the savings held by the people of Québec. These two documents have been at the foundation of any political discussions for 10 years and the government continues to hide them.

Bourassa has lied

The pros and cons of federalism, the Québec-Press: What strikes you most, Guy, about the "economic image of the Bourassa regime?"

Guy Joron: That's a good question, because it's really a regime that governs through images, through large distortion, far from reality.

What strikes me above all is to think that the Liberals were elected in 1970 on the theme of economic development! Bourassa was even presented as an economist rather than the little lawyer specializing in fiscal rights that he really is (who studied by correspondence economic courses, sometimes in the evenings).

The secret manner in which the Liberals govern characterizes, above all, their regime. They hide all essential economic dossiers, and spend much of the time "begging" for foreign capital. Bourassa has sold out to English-Canadian and American capital.

James Bay

G.P.: Let's take some examples of these secret economic documents...

G.J.: The first case which comes to mind is obviously James Bay, the largest distortion of all. Bourassa proceeded vigorously with the project without completing serious and well-researched studies. He even hid the Hydro-Québec documents that came out in favour of a cost in figures for Québec belonging to Canada, is a major concern. The preceding governments had understood this and, up to 1968, there was a balance—one that wasn't to Québec's advantage. Former prime minister Bertrand confirmed this during the 1970 campaign. I asked Bourassa at least 30 times in the National Assembly if the studies were being perused. He always replied "yes" until Easter time this year, when the cat was finally let out of the bag. Finance Minister Garneau told me that the studies had been stopped because they didn't want to waste any money uselessly!

Garneau thus contradicted Bourassa, who therefore, had lied at least 30 times in the National Assembly. In my opinion this one situation destroyed all of the Liberals' credibility. They pretend that federalism is advantageous for Québec, but they don't give a damn about the compatibility of this position with economic independence...

G.P.: And the dossier on savings?

G.J.: It's another secret study made in 1972 by the ministry of industry and commerce. It proves, without any doubt, that the Québécois do not have to depend on foreign capital to assure their own economic development.

The report is under lock and key

We were given glimpses of this document on February 5, 1973, when industry minister Guy Saint-Pierre made a speech in Montreal. He revealed that the savings of the Québécois were sufficient to finance our investments except in very special cases like James Bay. The only problem is to channel this savings into Québec. Saint-Pierre also said that, according to all available statistics, Québec hasn't needed for the past few years a large supply of foreign capital.

Now, how did he arrive at this solution? Saint-Pierre must have caught hell from Bourassa, because we haven't heard him speak about it since. The government has sat on top of the report. And the report is under lock and key with the key in the pocket of Paul Desrochers. Only seven people have access to this document...

These are unacceptable circumstances. That's why the PQ clearly stated in its program that it will make sure that distribution of information is assured by making the government's economic documents public.

Bourassa goes begging

G.P.: That leads up to the second large symbol, according to you, of the Bourassa government: the "Begging" for foreign capital.

G.J.: The Liberals tell us on all sides of the question that we are poor, that we haven't a cent, that we're incompetent! True to their own logic they then go all over the world to borrow money. They quite literally, selling Québec. So Bourassa travels to New York where he concludes a large loan del. He then exclaims: foreign investment in the future of Québec. What he doesn't see is that this money is borrowed in Québec from the pockets of Québécois. For example, the large American insurance company, Metropolitan Life, buys up Québec with the interest from their own insurance policies.

G.P.: And the subsidies to large corporations?

G.J.: It's the same attitude of dependency. It's rumoured that the Liberals are very easily impressed by multinationals like ITT and IBM. They give them gifts with our taxes, lend them money and give them fiscal exemptions. There is always something we have to pay for these companies who come here for our trees and mines in a time of scarcity of natural resources that we're now entering into, one should put the companies in their places instead of wasting away our riches.

G.P.: In summing up, how would you classify this government?

G.J.: The words which come immediately to mind are the following: dependency, submission, powerlessness. A picture of perfect colonization.

U of T cans 24-hour veggies

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Mark up another defeat for the forces of good.

A new quick-serve restaurant will open soon at the former Huron and Harbord location of Meat and Potatoes. But Karma Retailers, the sponsors of an unsuccessful proposal for a 24-hour vegetarian restaurant have claimed unfair treatment by the U of T administration.

Karma spokesman John Percy said that his organization arranged to sublet the restaurant from the main leasee, George Penstone. Karma gave him a $1000 deposit.

But "a few days later when we were in the store cleaning up" Randy Grimes from the office of the vice-president in charge of Business Affairs came over and cancelled the university's agreement with Penstone, saying he had no authority to sublease.

This cancelled Karma's agreement.

Penstone, however, had sublet the restaurant from Bob Levant who made Meat and Potatoes a success and had himself sublet it once this past summer, Percy noted.

Grimes, in a telephone interview, claimed that the university didn't want George as the middleman, "with the profits going to him." The administration "wanted to deal directly with the parties concerned". Grimes described Penstone as something of an operator "who was trying to rip the kids off" by charging a large sum for the sublease.

Percy said that Penstone had asked $3000 for the sublease. Karma offered $1,500. Penstone settled for $2,000. Karma gave him a $1,000 deposit.

Percy also claimed that the Business Affairs office had violated its own deadlines for submissions.

Percy said that all proposals were to be submitted by a certain Monday in the summer and that a decision was to have been announced the following Friday.

When Percy phoned Grimes on the Friday, Grimes was unable to announce his decision saying, according to Percy, that he was waiting for another proposal.

Percy implied that this proposal was the successful one, that of Steve Ilyo and his wife.

Grimes disputed Percy's claim. The Ilyos, he said, "were the first people to contact us, way before anyone else did".

The Business Affairs office's decision was delayed but not through waiting for any other proposals.

"It was caused by our consulting a number of other people for their advice," Grimes said.

Grimes said that the office had tried to reach the right decision for the neighborhood.

The decision was based strictly on the experience that the different applicants had in the restaurant business and on whether the proposed business would provide a measure of stability in the area, Grimes said.

Grimes noted the president of the Huron and Sussex Tenants' Association had been consulted.

Grimes said Karma Retailers members when asked what experience they had in the restaurant business had replied that a number of them "had worked in restaurants," but they were not able to remember which restaurants.

Grimes said he thought the group had been fairly notified, over the phone and in writing, of the reasons for the delay.

Percy described the restaurant which the group would have run.

"We were going to offer very healthy food—very, very cheaply".

"It would have been about the cheapest place in town to eat anything let alone good healthy, nutritious food".

Percy quoted a few items from the menu ("we had even got the menu printed!"): "home cooked french fries: 15 cents; an ordinary grilled cheese sandwich: 20 cents' spaghetti and soyballs: 35 cents".

Percy described the restaurant as "a facility Toronto is presently lacking."

Percy said that the restaurant would have followed the same entertainment policy as Meat and Potatoes, which included a live folk singer.

The Karma group independently purchased the chattels in the restaurant.

"We own every chair, every electrical wire, every nail, every light bulb, even the boards on the wall, everything and we will take it all with us if we have to move."

"We will establish what we planned to establish there in another location if we have to."

Percy estimated that the "hassle" has cost the group $1700 independent of the deposits for the sublease and the chattels.

The Variety-Michael Gough

"There's something unethical about this", he said.

He said that the cost of moving would be another $1000 and renovating costs would be "at least another $1000."

Things to say when offered a Golden:

- Don't mind if I do.
- Sure. Why not?
- Well, if you insist.

Mystery and comedy makes glorious trash

"All the sincerity in Hollywood could be put into a flea's navel with room left over for eight caraway seeds and an agent's heart" commented Fred Allen once, and his remark might have been the inspiration for The Last of Sheila. Half old-fashioned murder mystery, half trendy comedy, Sheila is glorious trash for the audience who liked Sleuth, of which this movie is a less genteel, showbiz version.

The murder occurs amid a bunch of Hollywooders vacationing off the cote d'Azur. Each of them has a nasty little secret, and the plot's propulsion comes from everyone trying to ferret out the others' secrets while keeping the lid on his own, which becomes complicated because the characters are linked together by such tangled ties: marital, sexual, parasitic, sadistic, nostalgic, what have you. The only thing they're not to one another is friends, though with cynical bravado they keep asserting that they are.

The solution is very nicely worked out, with clues like cigarette butts, a bushelbasket of motives, and various reconstructions of the crime; even if you're as thick about such things as I am you have a good chance of getting onto the murderer here. (There is a gaping flaw, but it would be churlish to point it out). If "whodunit" is to you as appealing a question as whether it was a cockroach or a dung beetle that Kafka had in mind, there is still enough to enjoy: the ritzy production, the bawdy dialogue, and Dyan Cannon.

Stars in this movie are James Mason, Joan Hackett, James Coburn, Richard Benjamin and Ian McShane, listed alphabetically in the titles but here in descending order of quality. But the most interesting contrast is between Raquel Welch and Dyan Cannon.

Raquel Welch is touted not only as sex incarnate but as a star. In The Last of Sheila she plays a parody of herself, a sexpot starlet. Whoever thought such a role was comfortably within Welch's ambit was wrong (though one kindhearted viewer liked her for trying so hard). Furthermore, with her outrageous epoxy-résin curves and terrifying sharklike smile, she looks like something carved on a Hindu temple.

The movie scintillates when Cannon is onscreen; she appeals on every level. A creditable actress, a terrific comedienne, and an alluring woman, she has stolen and salvaged every movie she's been in. Nonetheless she is thought of as "supporting" material. Only standards as screwy as Hollywood's could prefer the egregious Welch to the ineffable Cannon. But then we have to remember that Cannon divorced Gary Grant in a trial which was very bad publicity for the aging heartthrob, while Welch scribbles off letters to Time and Newsweek in defense of Frank Sinatra. Maybe those standards aren't screwy, just corrupt.

And that's the truth!

Diane D'Aquila and William Webster are obviously engrossed in their discussion of creative scatology in this scene from Clear Light. Guess what's under the newspaper.

Clear Light shows all ugliness-no hope

Clear Light, Toronto Free Theatre's recent production, is unabashedly an orgy of ugliness. Overflowing with all that could be considered disgusting and humiliating, the play sets out to terrorize and certainly succeeds.

We are at first confronted with five relatively disturbed characters who have met in an apartment with no windows for a game of crazy eights. The picture could be innocent and perhaps even comic, but playwright Michael Hollingsworth leaves little room for such thoughts right from the beginning. An eerie forboding surrounds the bizarre set and the actors who wander across the stage area before the actual action begins.

The play begins with the declaration that "art is living shit", a posture which Hollingsworth seems bound to prove irrevocably through the course of the evening. He begins this scatological theme with Dick, the most repulsive creature presented. When he leaves the washroom his hand is covered with his own excrement which he soon eats. He subsequently vomits, undoubtedly due to his intake of the aforesaid and great amounts of cat food.

The action soon moves from the mere physically disgusting to the realm of the truly frightening. The five characters participate in horrific scenes of rape, sadomasochism and even cannibalism. All the actions are done with such grotesque realism that pretense seems to vanish. While some members of this particular audience seemed to find the violence and degradation humorous, others squirmed nervously, perhaps frightened that the actors had abandoned pretense and were soon to leave the stage and brandish knives and razor blades.

Actors Patrick Brymer, Diane D'Aquila, Bick Mancuso, Susan Petrie and William Webster are all equally part of this world, so definitely immersed in the ugliness, that pity is felt for their plight both during and after the show. Gregory Glanis-Workum excellently accompanies with despairing wails of the saxophone.

Hollingsworth's purpose and result are consistent. This consistency is definitely to be admired. However his vision is so negative, so lacking in hope and dignity that one can't help leaving the theatre feeling empty, frightened and alone. It is this lack of hope in Clear Light which is to be questioned and even rejected.

Festival offers drama from many lands

Last year the International Theatre Festival took a gamble on Toronto being ready for more than English-language theatre.

Much to the surprise of Toronto's cultural establishment, the gamble paid off. On October 28 the festival will kick off its second season at the Town Hall with 17 plays in 13 different languages.

The festival is co-sponsored by the St. Lawrence Centre and the Multicultural Theatre Association. The latter consists of theatre groups long active in their own communities who now want to expand their audience to include people of all communities and cultures.

Association president Guenter Petricek is literally driving himself into the ground with the administrative work for the Festival. (He is also directing the Players Buehne 72 production, Physicists, to be shown November 17.)

Petricek's goal is for Toronto's non-WASP communities to present that which is unique to their own communities and yet transcend cultural barriers.

His major disappointment is that only three of the non-English speaking companies will be performing in English.

"I would prefer that the festival itself would eventually be in English simply because English itself is Toronto's principal language," he said in an interview last month. But not everyone in the association agrees with him, not even his own company (which will be performing in German).

However, the Canadian Japanese Theatre, the Polish Arabeska Student Theatre and the Lithuanian Theatre Aukuras will perform in English. Also, on October 30 the two winners of the Association's contest for young Canadian playwrights will be directed by Gino Marrocco of Back Door Theatre.

And translation works both ways. The Latvian Theatre Group plans to present a French play, Moliere's Tartuffe — but in Latvian.

Power of speech seduces and destroys a once-mute clown

A sentence is something to be crazy with. A sentence is something to create order with. A sentence can be a model of yourself. When Kaspar first stumbles onto the stage at the Firehall Theatre, a half-clown, half-puppet form, he had only one sentence, "I want to be a person." Because he is unable to do anything with that sentence he is also half-human, a fact dramatized by his open-mouthed, mask face.

Urged on by the disembodied exhortations of mechanically amplified voices, he undertakes a primitive exploration of the words in his sentence along with the objects on the stage, the tools of potential stage-craft. The stage props are reduced to a broken, over-turned, non-functioning chaos, like the thought processes of Kaspar's mind. But gradually the programization of the public address system voices begins to take hold. Kaspar learns the power of communication; he arranges the words of his sentence in various working patterns and at the same time organizes a new, neatly ordered set. Splinter Kaspars enter and begin to explore the definitions of working, eating or playing as they move about the stage.

The second part of the play places Kaspar at a microphone, his mask face now more human. Having been socialized by language he examines its communicative and creative possibilities. Words flow out in the authoritative tones used for social propaganda, moral subjugation or bureaucratic rule-making. They soften into a plea, take-on the histrionic intonations of a public orator or rhetorician and then melt into the monotones of a media-smooth voice.

Here the manipulative power of thought and language asserts supremacy, building a frightening tension into the play. Language has now wrapped Kaspar in a kind of air-tight, impenetrable shroud. The sounds around him split into two factions — the melodious, soothing harmonies of the amplified programmes and the disjunctive, cacophonous shrieks of the chorus of splinter Kaspars. Kaspar is told that "sentences are for the birds". But in fact they are monsters like the paranoid delusions of Othello's "goats and monkeys" — which is also Kaspar's last desperate cry as he is destroyed by the same processes which created him. Peter Handke's play is a powerful piece, given careful and largely successful direction by Pamela Terry Beckwith. It is based on the real life story of a teenage boy who, in 1828, was found wandering the streets of Nuremberg emaciated, unsocialized and able to speak only one sentence.

Handke's adaptation of this tale penetrates the delicate balance between speech and consciousness, consciousness and indoctrination, indoctrination and loss of self. And Terence Belleville's Kaspar, although lacking a mimist's precision necessary for the role, does evoke much of the poignancy and desperation of Kaspar's strange isolation from humanity.

Hungary: 1956 - a workers' revolt crushed by the "workers' state"

This week marks one of the most significant — but least observed — anniversaries of the twentieth century: that of the Hungarian Revolution of 1956, when the Hungarian workers rose against the "workers' state".

The fact that the events of 1956 have been suppressed or misrepresented by the world's major propaganda machines is far from surprising.

The "free world", despite its desire to score points against the Russians, could scarcely be expected to applaud a revolution that sought to overthrow a 'Communist' government, not because it was instituting communism, but because it wasn't.

The Russians and their friends, of course, have no wish whatever to have it publicized that the 'counter-revolutionary fascist gangs' they crushed with thousands of tanks comprised virtually the entire population of Hungary — office workers, factory workers, students, housewives, intellectuals, artists, farmers, and even the army — united in workers' and community councils, demanding and instituting a thorough-going socialism — hardly the usual form taken by 'fascist counter-revolutions'.

The contribution of the Chinese Mao-cultists, meanwhile, for whom all that was best in Russia died with kindly Joe Stalin, has been to criticize the Russian 'revisionists' for not being severe enough in putting the rising down.

All the more important, then, to draw lessons from those fateful days.

For the successes of this revolution, brief as it was, did as much as a century of socialist theorizing to show what a united and determined people could do to transform their society.

"From the first moment of victory, mistrust must be directed not longer against the conquered reactionary parties, but against the workers' previous allies, against the party that wishes to exploit the common victory for itself alone... The workers must put themselves at the command not of the State authority but of the revolutionary community councils. Arms and ammunition must not be surrendered on any pretext."

Friedrich Engels

And its defeat spelled out in letters of blood the message that Soviet Russia, far from being the cradle or exporter of revolution, was as barbaric a counter-revolutionary butcher as the world had ever seen.

The story began in 1944, when the Red Army drove the retreating Nazi forces out of eastern Europe. Hard bargaining between Churchill, Stalin, and Roosevelt produced a post-war division of spoils; Russia was awarded roughly all of eastern Europe — the area her armies occupied.

Stalin scrupulously kept his part of the bargain: he betrayed the Greek communists, on the verge of seizing power — Greece had been assigned to Britain's sphere of influence. And he instructed the Communist parties of Italy and France, armed, and with supporters numbering in the millions, not to attempt to seize power but rather to disarm the resistance and cooperate with the bourgeois parties.

"All workers, socialists, even communists, must at least understand that a bureaucratic state has nothing to do with Socialism."

Nemzetor, Jan. 15 1957

Contrary to American Cold War propaganda, Russia's desires were conservative, not expansionary. She sought American economic aid, but was refused acceptable terms. The Russians demanded friendly regimes in eastern Europe as a buffer against a potentially revived Germany — hardly outrageous after the experience of two invasions in less than 30 years — but made no demand that they be communist — indeed, the early regimes they set up almost invariably consisted of liberal or conservative politicians.

It was only after the U.S. initiated the Cold War — pressuring Russia heavily on all fronts — that Stalin and his cohorts hardened their positions, and began to install their supporters in the eastern European governments.

In Hungary, the first government set up by the Russians after the fascist Horthy regime collapsed was headed by General Bela Miklos, a Horthy supporter who had been personally honoured by Hitler himself. The Communists occupied a number of posts, including the Ministry of the Interior, through which they controlled the army and the police. They reorganized and extensively used the secret police, (the A.V.O.) retaining many of the personnel from the fascist days. Gradually their hold on the state was tightened.

Terms of trade favourable to Russia were established, peasants were forced to collectivize their holdings. When, in 1948, the factories were nationalized, this occurred without the participation or even knowledge of the workers on whose behalf the action was ostensibly taken. Hungarian workers came back to work after Easter to find themselves with a new boss — the state. Other than that, very little had changed for them, politically, in their work, or in their daily lives, from the fascist days.

While political repression continued unabated, economic exploitation was stepped up. Piece-work, what Marx called a "lever for lengthening the working day and the lowering of wages," was introduced on a massive scale. Periodically, purges rid the Communist party of dissenters. 'Go-slow' movements and other forms of 'passive resistance' increased rapidly. In response, the "workers' government" instituted severe penalties. Forced labour camps came into existence. It became a crime for a worker to leave his or her job.

The 'revelations' Krushchev made about Stalin in 1956, accompanied by a slight liberalization in the regime and promises of reform, encouraged rising hopes. But there was caution, too — the memory of the crushing, with tanks, of workers' risings in East Berlin in 1953 and Poland in June 1956, were still too fresh in many minds.

But in the summer of 1956, intellectual agitation, for freedom of speech, for the abolition of exploitative trade treaties with the Soviet Union, for an end to repression, swept Hungary. A demonstration was called in Budapest — first forbidden, and then, when it had already formed, 'permitted' by the government. The demands were fairly mild — certainly none of them were counter to the rhetoric, if not the practice, of the Communists. The demands called for independence, socialism, secret ballots, the right of workers and specialists to run the factories, and the removal of the hated 'Rakosi group' from the government.

When the demonstrators — numbering over 100,000 but peaceful — asked that their views be broadcast over the State radio, they were fired on by the machine guns of the secret police, and the demonstration had turned into a revolution.

The workers in the arms factories began to distribute weapons and ammunition. Many soldiers and policemen joined the demonstrators or turned over their weapons to them.

"Piece-work is the form of wages most in harmony with the capitalist mode of production... it serves as a lever for lengthening the working day and the lowering of wages."

Karl Marx

"Piece-work is a revolutionary system that eliminates inertia and makes the labourer hostile. Under the capitalist system loafing and laziness are fostered. But now, everyone has a chance to work harder and earn more."

Scantels ('Communist' daily)

Groups spontaneously formed to control central arteries and city squares. Sporadic fighting with the secret police broke out.

Russian tanks moved into the city and the fighting intensified. Significant numbers of Russian soldiers, however, defied their orders and refused to fire on the Hungarians. They were rapidly shipped back to Russia. In some cases, groups of Hungarian workers and Russian soldiers seen fraternizing were shot down.

A peaceful demonstration at the A.V.O. (secret police) headquarters was fired on with machine guns, with over 250 casualties. After this incident, A.V.O. men, reaping the results of the hatred they had sown, were killed whenever they were found.

In the midst of the fighting, Workers' Councils were born in all the major centres and places of work. In a remarkably short period of time, these spontaneously invented institutions had taken over the management of the economy, the manufacture of weapons, the distribution of foodstuffs and goods, the co-ordination of armed groups, and communication.

The power of the government was totally broken; even its armed forces either went over to the revolution or stayed in the barracks, refusing all orders. When after three days of fighting Russian troops were withdrawn from the cities, the government was reduced to alternately broadcasting appeals to the population, and denunciations of "counter-revolutionary" forces. Both were equally ignored.

The exercise of power now lay with the Workers' Councils, not with an impotent government. The councils were formed everywhere: factories, mines, state farms, offices, educational institutions, on the railways... Mass meetings at which everyone had one vote made all decisions. Decisions encompassing more than the immediate unit were made by delegated regional, provincial, and a national council. All delegates were immediately recallable. Without a party to lead them, without a state apparatus, the Hungarian workers — i.e. the vast majority of the population — took over the running of their society, and began to radically change it.

"Economic relations are relations between people: who tells whom what to do and how to do it. Property relations are relations between people and things: who owns what: land, factories, mines, ships, etc. These are basic definitions in the science of political economy as elaborated by Marx and Engels. But for many years, carried away by the promises of the Plan, the majority of Marxists have forgotten this. That is, they forgot who was telling whom what to do and how to do it... (Their view) was based upon the extremely simple and extremely false thesis that state ownership of property equals workers' state."

C. L. R. James

The managers of the factories were removed, yet production continued, with priorities set by the factories. The London Observer reported: "A fantastic aspect of the situation is that although the general strike is in being and there is no centrally-organised industry, the workers are nevertheless taking it upon themselves to keep essential services going, for purposes which they themselves determine and support. Workers' Councils in industrial districts have undertaken the distribution of essential goods and food to the population, in order to keep them alive. The coal miners are making daily allocations of just sufficient coal to keep the power stations going and supply the hospitals in Budapest and other large towns. Railwaymen organise trains to go to approved destinations for approved purposes..."

Within days, twenty-five new daily newspapers appeared, with believable news and conflicting opinions openly presented.

Hungary had made a successful communist revolution. Successful, except for one thing. Early in November, Russian troops moved in again. The tanks, planes, and machine-guns of the world's most powerful army were used to crush the resistance of the tiny (10 million) revolutionary nation. For a week, armed resistance continued, but then it was drowned in blood. Even afterwards, a general strike continued for weeks and the workers' councils attempted to continue operating. Ironic posters appeared proclaiming: "Danger, 10 million counter-revolutionary agents still at large". Not for months was resistance completely broken. But finally the revolution was defeated — at least for the present.

But even in defeat, the revolution taught some invaluable lessons, both negative and positive, to all those who were willing to heed them.

The nature of the Soviet Union was made utterly clear.

For a long time, Russia had been seen as the homeland of revolution, a nation that, despite its failures and faults, was treading a new path for mankind.

Few had understood that the Russian revolution, taking place in a tremendously backward country with a tiny working class, and led by a party that denied workers the right to manage their factories and gain the experiences that were necessary for a socialist consciousness, had been unable, in its isolation and in the face of the active hostility of the rest of the world, to accomplish what it set out to do. Instead, the Bolsheviks were forced to

"Released from the fear that art and literature must serve only politics, sensing all around them the expansion of human needs, human capacities, and cooperation, the Hungarian people created twenty-five newspapers overnight, the older artists and the younger talents pouring out news, articles, stories, and poems, in a flood-tide of artistic energy."

C.L.R. James

"Workers' management of production, government from below, and government by consent ... (are) one and the same thing."

propel the nation into the industrial age with the managers, bureaucrats and techniques of capitalism — but of a capitalism in which all property belonged to the state — state capitalism. Marx had predicted that only advanced industrial nations could achieve socialism. The Bolsheviks used superhuman efforts to prove him wrong, but failed.

The result was a rapid degeneration of the revolution. Bureaucracy and over-centralization ran rampant as the dictatorship of the proletariat became the dictatorship over the proletariat. The essential social and economic relations of capitalism continued unchanged — Russia was no more a workers' state than Sweden or the United States.

Indeed, as the western countries such as the U.S. moved into the era of the welfare state and ever greater state intervention in the economy, increasingly, the major difference between the west and the Russian bloc came to be a gap in living standards, quickly being lessened, and a lack of political freedoms (though this is true of many "free world" countries as well). For ordinary people, the differences between the competitive capitalist societies and the state capitalist societies were largely academic.

And for their governments, their relationships became those of competing imperialist blocs — the American, vastly more powerful, being the more aggressive — whose differences were major, but hardly irreconcilable. The current U.S.-Russian detente bears witness to that.

The Hungarian workers were among the first to understand this, and to understand that their conditions and relations under "Socialism" were no different from those they had experienced under capitalism. They rose to oust the privileged bureaucracy that was exploiting them.

"The relations of production (boss-worker; manager-managed; order-giver-order-taker) remain the basis of the class structure of any society. In all countries of the world these relations are capitalist relations because they are based on wage labour. The Hungarian working class attempted to transcend class society by striking at the very roots of the social system.

"Certain Western observers thought their methods 'chaotic'. They deplored their 'absence of organisation'. But the Hungarian workers had instinctively grasped, although perhaps not explicitly proclaimed, that they must break completely with those traditional forms which had for years entrapped both them and the working class of the West. This was their strength. New organs of struggle were created: the Workers' Councils which embodied, in embryo, the new society they were seeking to achieve."

(from Andy Anderson, Hungary 56)

By showing that socialism has nothing in common with state bureaucracies or state capitalism, that liberation cannot be legislated or bestowed but only desired and taken, and by indicating a fundamental form of socialist society — the form as efficient as it is liberating — the Hungarian people pointed the way for the rest of the world. It is up to us to follow that road.

Elf rocks and rolls

Elf
Epic (Columbia); $6.29

The first Elf album is good news for those bored by rock and roll music which neither rocks nor rolls. There are no fancy orchestras, string and horn sections or electronic wizardry to bog Elf down; they just play the kind of rock most established groups have lost sight of or forgotten.

This four-man-band from the southern US — works its way through eight tunes with surprisingly fresh, crisp playing. From the opening cut, "Hoochie Koochie Lady", through to the closing of "Gambler, Gambler" the playing and singing is first class.

My only complaint — and that can't be blamed on the band — is the fact that there is only sixteen minutes of playing time on each side, which means that while prices of records are going up all the time we are getting less music than before.

Lead singer and bass player Ronald Padovana has a voice that fits in somewhere between the sound of Free and the Guess Who. But that never detracts from the music. The ever present piano playing by Mickey Lee Soule keeps the tempo and the tunes rocking along, while David Feinstein on lead guitar and Gary Driscoll on drums drive a solid beat from beginning to end.

A fantastic first effort.

London cuts prices on collection-starters

The World of the Organ
The World of the Trumpet
London, $2.98

A few issues ago I was bitching in this paper about London Records' policy of pricing "Best of" or "Greatest Hits" collections of classical music at $6.29, principally because the music on those discs had been available for years at full price. Well, somebody at their office must have seen that article, because not soon after I received a couple of items in the London series "The World of...," which puts together selections from the tape vaults for only $2.98 apiece.

On the whole, these discs are quite successful examples of what can be done with reissues and what are often called "old chestnuts", the works which simply everybody knows. It's wrong to think that everybody is familiar with the works on The World of The Trumpet, though. If you're just starting a classical collection to complement your rock or folk, or if you're just starting collecting, this is the type of record to get a hold of.

If trumpet music isn't quite your style, this "World of..." series apparently goes on and on. Another one sent to me was the organ disc.

Johann Sebastian Bach was the greatest composer to ever write for the instrument, and his massive works still remain the bulk of the repertoire. No organ record would be complete without his Toccata and Fugue in D minor, so London dutifully presents it here, in a performance by Karl Richter. Bach is well represented on the rest of the disc, with Widor, Franck, Purcell, Walford Davies and Jeremiah Clarke making up the rest of the program.

London Records, thou hast redeemed thyself. At $2.98 a record, these programs are an excellent alternative to full-priced "Greatest Hits of..." records. However, it wouldn't surprise me in the least if next week a new item turned up for me to review: "The World of Trumpet Voluntary", played by a chorus of trained penguins, by a group of marxist-leninist street-fighters, by a kazoo virtuoso, and so on...

Nillson strikes again

A Little Touch of Schmilsson in the Night
Harry Nilsson
RCA

Harry Nilsson's underground reputation as a respected songwriter, and purveyor of some of the finest interpretations of Randy Newman's soft ballads, underwent a considerable re-evaluation when Harry hit hard with two successive (and resoundingly successful) rock albums. Unpredictable Harry brought a new element under the diversified aegis of rock music this summer, when he handpicked twelve pre-rock classics, such as "As Time Goes By" and "For Me and My Gal", and released them on this impeccable album. Thirty-nine musicians under the able baton of Gordon Jenkins joined with Nilsson in that one. This album proves that Derek Taylor's statement, calling Harry "unquestionably the best contemporary singer in the world" contains more than a few grains of truth.

"Always" and "I Wonder Who's Kissing Her Now" haven't been too big at the discotheque in the past 30 or so years. But anyone who sees the pop-rock tradition as part of an 18-year-old continuum, can appreciate that the dozen picks on Harry's beautiful album were to their era what "Hey Jude" and "Yesterday" are to this one.

Fords eat Chevs - on the road again

Fords Eat Chevs
by John Sandman
Oberon Press

John Sandman is that rarity in Canadian Literature: a novelist who takes a critical look at his country. Grants from the Canada Council and the Province of Ontario Council for the Arts helped in the writing of his latest novel Fords Eat Chevs, just as these grants help in one form or another in the production of a great deal of literature published in Canada. What Sandman avoids, however, is the kind of provincial sentimentality about Canada which is the obvious pitfall of this kind of government aid.

Nick, the central character of the novel is unfairly fired from his job in Toronto. He is unable to react against his enemies, or even to recognize them clearly. He is ashamed of losing his job and, instead of facing his family with the news, he drifts to Sudbury and later to Vancouver looking for work. This begins his long journey across the country.

Nick at first is only vaguely aware of the distance that separates Toronto from Vancouver. As his journey continues, he comes to a growing awareness of his new role in society as one of the several kinds of drifters who cross the country every summer. And despite what government advertisements for youth hostels claim, it is not a pleasant journey. Nick meets businessmen who are as dull as the prairies, hippies, young college radicals and angry cowboys. His appearance becomes grimy and his anger more overt.

Sandman's sense of language is dazzling. He has an astute sense of how people measure, accept and reject each other in their conversations. Moreover, Sandman understands the hallucinatory quality of reality on the road. Nick finds out about the nightmare that is as much a part of Canada as vanity books about Old Toronto or the Yukon. Cowboys on Saturday night are not pleasant, nor is it a good experience to hear the prejudices of everyone who gives you a ride. Throughout the book different kinds of language flow against each other until we, like Nick, realize that certain words not only measure reality hierarchically, but also place Nick in a very low position within the hierarchy. Fords Eat Chevs is an intelligently written book and a necessary challenge to the Canadian reality.

How Roots give your feet a good feeling, then send it up your spine.

To see the idea behind Roots, take a side-view look at the shoe. Instead of a heel to lift you up and tilt you forward, you'll find a one-piece base to plant you firmly in touch with Mother Earth. Roots, you see, work very much like roots. And if you take a side-view look at the human foot, you'll see why they work as well as they do. Your heel is the lowest part of your foot, so in Roots it sits in the lowest part of your shoe.

Suddenly you stand straighter as additional muscles in the back of your legs and the small of your back spring to life to help hold you up and move you around. Now consider that recess in your sole called the arch. If you spend a good deal of time on your feet, unsupported arches can sag and may fall out of shape altogether. (This is why in those pre-cruiser days a policeman was known as a flatfoot.) To help prevent your arches from falling, Roots are contoured to support them. There's a smaller recess between the balls of your feet which Roots will take care of as well.

Near the front, you'll notice the sole is curved like a rocker. In normal walking, your weight lands first on your heel, shifts along the outer side of your foot, then diagonally across to your big toe which springs you off on your next step. The rocker idea simply makes that transfer of weight a little easier, which makes each step a little less tiring.

All told, Roots bring a good, natural feeling to man's somewhat unnatural custom of treading hard floors and city sidewalks. Roots are designed and made in Canada; and at the heart of our production are two generations of cobblers (a father and three sons) who cling to the premise that good quality footwear must still be made largely by hand. The way we feel about making Roots has a lot to do with the way you'll feel wearing them.

Bruce Cockburn is well - received here

Bruce Cockburn was greeted at Massey Hall last week like he had scored the goal that won the Stanley Cup. He accepted the applause with a lovely smile, at the same time enjoying it and recognizing that it was a bit out of proportion. There are moments when a public figure gets amplified beyond what he had ever wanted, and he is as powerless to affect what has been created in his name as any more individual in the audience. Cockburn's smile was the sunny opposite side of the coin to Mick Jagger's pointless grin when things got out of hand at Altamont.

Worship embarrasses me even when the idol is shared. When James Taylor was applauded one time for taking a drink of water, it took the bloom off the show though he played well enough. At the Cockburn concert I felt awkward sitting and clapping through the standing ovation, as if my offering was being sneered at by all the other pilgrims.

All this has little enough to do with Cockburn himself, who handled it with equanimity. He is a fine solo guitarist and one of our best song-writers. He only pales against his own myth.

A song-writer has to first write a respectable song, at which point he becomes "promising". He fulfills the promise when he writes more. The third, and hardest, test comes after he already has a parcel of good work behind him — as Cockburn has. There comes a point when he has to shed his successes and try a new style. Prolonged adolescence is as unbecoming in a writer as in a person, no matter how prodigious the childhood has been. Bruce Cockburn's concert and his new album, Night Vision, show him on the way to becoming a full-fledged artist. Cockburn is moulting, as he has to.

There have always been two types of Cockburn song: one short, tuneful and whimsical, the other longer, mystical and musically complex. I never liked the second kind. That could be my lack of sophistication or it could be his indulgence. In any case there is always half an album I don't play and half a concert that leaves me lost, confused or bored. Illusion is queen/ in the shallow graves of experience-centred/ grave silence reigns over the stars/ while the earth unwinds — such lines hold no meaning for me and send no shivers up my spine.

But, lines like When the sun goes nova and the world turns over, I don't want to be alone, so honey come on home or You don't have to play the horses, life's a gamble all the same or Everywhere you look, the blues got the world by the balls — those lines tickle me just fine. While there may be a new, older Cockburn in the long songs — it is hard to discriminate in what you don't like — there is definitely one in the new little tunes. The whimsy is still there, but the vision is darker, the comedy more resigned. These songs are not better than "Goin' to the Country", "Happy Good Morning Blues,"

"Keep It Open", "Sunwheel Dance" or "One Day I Walk" but they are as good. The earlier tunes played out a rich vein and Cockburn has known enough to stake a new claim elsewhere.

There is a danger there. Leaving Massey Hall I heard a complaint about the "bluesy stuff", felt by a fan as a kind of betrayal. But I think it's the indication that Cockburn may wind up listed with Emily Carr, Lorne Harris or Joni Mitchell.

Stivell's music covers many times and places

Alan Stivell and his band came to St. Lawrence Centre last Sunday night without the slightest fanfare. His records are never played on even the most sophisticated English radio programs and most people don't even know where Brittany is, let alone know that its ancient Celtic culture is at the heart of Stivell's music. Yet he packed the house. And the exclusively French audience responded by giving the group two rousing ovations that led to two spectacular encores.

Stivell's music is eclectic and eccentric. But it is obviously important. It completely defies categorization, yet the band's energy is as pervasive as any rock group, intense as the best contemporary jazz, and as easy as country music.

Stivell and his band come from the province of Brittany, in northwestern France, where remnants of a Celtic language and culture still survive. They have revived long-forgotten Celtic instruments, such as Stivell's hand-hewn wooden harp, which stood dramatically spotlighted at the centre of the stage, and rediscovered old folk songs and jigs, some of which date from the Dark Ages. Both the instruments and the songs are brought up to date in a style which has all the adjectives of rock, jazz, folk, and country music.

The concert began with a soft acoustic song about Duke John IV which was strictly medieval in feel as well as content. From there the band went through a number of lively jigs, such as may be heard in Ireland or Wales to a wailing blueslike number which probably couldn't be heard anywhere else than where Stivell's band happens to be. In the second of the two sets Stivell emerged from the shadows to play what must be the first rock solo done on bagpipes. The drone and the eerie howling of the pipes electrified the crowd. Yet, most of the night Stivell was gently leaning over this harp, playing tones as clear as the idea of water.

Because of the band's unique instrumentation and music, dynamics is of prime importance to make their performance work.

And in this lies the band's great strength. For they performed with total control over this very important but often neglected aspect of music. They are thoroughly professional musicians, saying more with understatement than with sensationalism. For those who missed the concert there is only the record. And the record speaks for itself.

Alan Stivell treated the St. Lawrence Centre's Sunday night audience to a far-ranging display of Celtic folk music. Stivell's hand-carved harp was at the centre of the show.

Walsh gives variety and good hard rock

The performance of former James Gang member Joe Walsh and his band Barnstorm, Saturday at Massey Hall, was everything a good concert should be—once it got under way. Customs difficulties we were told kept them off until nearly midnight, but from the first number onward it was well worth the wait.

Walsh's forte is heavy, hard rock, the kind that drills right through you if it's well done. Walsh and his band are as good as anyone in the field, and better than most. Lately "heavy" music has degenerated into over-amped clichés, or into "glitter rock", Alice Cooper style. Walsh sets the record straight. He's soul-shaking loud, not ear-piercing loud; he's dynamic and driving while still remaining intimately tasteful.

Walsh always takes care to work with a varied musical palette, adding electronics, like tape-loop echo, and miscellaneous instruments when appropriate, to spice things up. Walsh also makes the most of his unusual instrumental format of piano, bass, organ and drums.

Walsh's second number began with some beautifully arpeggiated piano, soon joined by graceful guitar apotheosis with a fascinating shimmering effect produced by a device Walsh told me was called a phase shifter.

Later on we were regaled with, among other things, a short drum solo where drummer Joe Vitale produced a definitive exposition of the percussive possibilities inherent in two bass drums (he also delivered a fine flute thing toward the end of the set).

The whole thing reached an incredible crescendo just before the end and Walsh's screaming guitar climaxed it all, as if the entire set had been one long piece. Massey Hall seemed to be rocketing sonically into the stratosphere.

What can we expect from Joe Walsh the next time round? He plans to go in many different directions, to diversify and increase the complexity and range of his sound with electronics. He wants to make use of the enormous expanse of gear open to electric music today, like the synthesizer or mellotron. Whatever the precise sounds it surely will be good.

Loud noise spoils fine lyrics and music

Jesse Winchester's concert last Sunday can only be described as a frustrating experience of the highest order, at least for those of us who aren't into sonic assault and battery. Many concerts rely on sheer volume of noise, usually to mask gaping inadequacies in the quality of the material. But what made Jesse Winchester's performance so annoying was that the incredible quantity of sound was the chief inadequacy.

For example, consider the lyrics. Winchester belongs to that rare class of songwriter-poets, whose asset is their ability to produce diamond-hard images and thus to convey ideas and feelings verbally as well as musically. Obviously, when the lyrical content of such songs is drowned out, you've really lost the essence of the music. With Winchester's group, not only were the lyrics effectively rendered unintelligible, but the quality of the musical performance wasn't good enough to go it alone.

Winchester himself plays the guitar and electric piano well enough to accompany his singing, but he certainly is no soloist. Moreover, his guitar was far too loud, while his piano was usually overpowered by the combined effort of the drummer and bass player.

My companion's only comment on the bass was, "Pudding," which I feel sums up the general shapelessness quite well.

The drummer, although a decent musician, came across as incessant and unmerciful, largely because there was some 60 decibels too much of him. And his stage presence was positively objectionable: something approaching the Liberator of the drum world. He seemed to be playing ringleader at times, or master of ceremonies. He also sang a few numbers, and though not off-key, his voice certainly didn't have much in the way of sensitivity. And why did he feel compelled to end every piece with a drum finale which sounded like someone pitching pots and pans down a flight of stairs? One high point in the performance could have been Winchester's warm expressive voice, but unfortunately it suffered the same fate as the lyrics — the good points were drowned out by the sheer volume of noise from the accompanying instruments.

Just to increase the frustration, there were a few numbers in which the drummer restrained himself, the bass player magically melted into oblivion, and the soft, uncluttered Jesse Winchester of "Third Down, 110 To Go" emerged. The nicest of these was a lovely childlike piece called "The Skip Rope Song", but there were one or two others, such as "Biloxi". Best of all, there was a striking hymn-like number at the end of the concert, sung without any significant accompaniment, called "You Can't Stand Up Alone".

Since it was the most moving of all the songs, it was also a reminder of something else that got lost in the floor-shaking volume: the emotion behind the music. But the only other time I was really moved by the music was when he sang "Yankee Lady". The poignancy of his exile cut through all the noise: "...a stranger by my birth". These rare moments only made the rest of the concert, in which words and notes and feelings all smeared into one another, seem more superfluous.

Jesse Winchester's songs are so full of meaning; it is sad that this meaning was sacrificed for something as useless as loud noise.

New organ makes its debut

Last Saturday, the Edward Johnson Concert Hall's new (and, as yet, unpaid for) organ was unveiled. This was the first of a series of inaugural concerts designed to help pay for the new instrument.

In any case, this concert did more than just raise money. Charles Peaker opened the program with Back's E flat major fugue, a work which immediately demonstrated how well the organ could fill the hall with its tone, although Peaker showed less than perfect control of the new instrument. His performance throughout was laboured with the result that one missed a sense of the music's coherence. However, I found his execution of Haydn's "The Clocks" an improvement over the first piece.

Perhaps the highlight of the first half of the concert came when Stephen Chenette, trumpet, joined Peaker for the "Two Choral Preludes" by Koch. Unfortunately much of the trumpet's tone was lost under the richness of the organ's sound, because Chenette was badly positioned close to the organ and away from the acoustical centre of the auditorium. But it was impressively performed. Torelli's "Sinfonia con tromba" concluded the first portion of the program. Here at last, after a somewhat shaky start Peaker seemed to be hitting his stride.

The special work "Music for Organ, Horn and Gongs", which was commissioned for the occasion, was given its premiere, with Mireilly Legacé as organist, Eugene Rittich as hornist and John Wyre as percussionist. This interesting new composition was both well performed by the soloists and well received by the audience. Much of the organ's sound though, was obscured by the loud moments for the horn or percussion.

The final item was the surprise of the evening. Couperin's "Gloria and Offertory (from Messe des Paroisses)" was imaginatively rendered by Legacé. The nature of this score was such that the organ's versatility and range were demonstrated more fully than at any other point in the evening. Her rhythmic sense, and in fact, her entire feeling for style contributed to a wonderful performance, showing the new organ to be well worth the expense to the faculty of music.

Orford Quartet is intense, romantic

This year the Orford Quartet will again be appearing at the St. Lawrence Centre, sharing the podium with some of the world's greatest string quartets. In many ways the youthful Orford Quartet is already of international calibre, and last Thursday's concert at the Edward Johnson Building gave convincing evidence to support this contention.

For the first time in years of attending Orford recitals, I was struck with a distinctive sound quality, one that is unique to this ensemble. Chamber music fans talk about a "Juilliard sound" or a "Budapest sound", trademarks of those great quartets. In a relatively short time the Orford has also evolved a quality which is unmistakably theirs: driving and intense, powerful but romantic. The Quartet has clearly defined the upper range of their dynamic spectrum and, while their pianissimos are not yet as convincing, they gave many glimpses of what is to come in this direction.

The recital opened, almost brashly, with Beethoven's last quartet, Op. 135. The ensemble's approach, apt in other works, was inappropriate here. In 1826 Beethoven was profoundly deaf, alone and impoverished. He no longer heard music, only imagined it. The fits and starts, the aborted snatches of melody, the timeless chordal progressions of this work require a generous canvas of time to materialize. The quartet appeared unsure of their dimensions in the opening movement, with the tempo tight and tense. The following Vivace, thematically clearer and structurally simpler, fared better. I always feel that Beethoven's last quartets bring us face to face with an abstraction that transcends his earlier "vocal" quartet writing. Instruments here are used as tools to grasp musical absolutes. The insistent vibrato of the first violin drew unnecessary attention towards one part of this greater whole. This quartet is obviously a recent addition to the Orford's repertoire, but one which will mature well.

Bartok's Fourth Quartet is his best known quartet, and was the highlight of the concert. It is a lush, exciting, almost brutal work which showed the Orford at their best. The opening Allegro was an overpowering Bartokian "barbaro", full of jagged cross rhythms and tone-cluster harmonies. The keystone to the arch-shaped construction of the five-movement work is the middle movement, marked "non troppo lento". The angularity of the poignant recitatives here was a little too rounded, shy of the Hungarian defiance which we expected.

The concluding work was Smetana's autobiographical Quartet in E minor, subtitled "From My Life". This is programme music at its best, self-explanatory and self-justifying. The Orford players sparked with individuality here, like four jewels held by a single setting. The only danger with such intrinsically exciting music is that if the performance is overly heated, the built-in climaxes are smothered by exaggerated anticipation. Thus, the high E in the last movement, signalling Smetana's oncoming deafness was surrounded with tremolos of almost Veridian bathos. The cool, insidious icy shaft of sound was played with a vibrato which took away its chilling effect.

Yet, in over-all effect this was a special concert. Special in the juxtaposition of three gigantic works, any one of which could have served as the high point of the average quartet recital. Also special in the enthusiasm which allows this relatively young ensemble to not only tackle the great Beethoven Op. 135, but to play it as the opening work of the concert. And special in the quality of performance which is exciting in actuality and thrilling in potential.

Menuhin's rendition is clean, precise

Bach: Three Harpsichord Concertos
George Malcolm

Menuhin, Menuhin Festival Orchestra

Bach: Two Concertos for Harpsichord and Two Concertos for Two Harpsichords same performers

Simon Preston, second harpsichord
Angel

These concertos are part of the standard repertoire for harpsichord players, although they are played just as often on the piano. Somehow they sound better on the former, because the percussive twang of the harpsichord is what Bach wrote them for, being a virtuoso player himself.

Originally, all the works were written for other instruments, such as the F major, which is a rewritten version of the fourth Brandenburg concerto. This was a standard Baroque practice, because there existed few cities where a pool of skilled musicians could be found. If a nobleman wanted to hear a particular piece, and the instrumentalists at the Court couldn't manage what was called for, they rewrote it to suit their own purposes. As a result, the Baroque music that has come down to us is durable stuff, able to shine in even the most unlikely arrangements.

This may be why a jazz recording of Bach or a synthesized version of Vivaldi still works musically, as opposed to what might happen if a Chopin prelude was rewritten for brass band.

The two new releases on Angel by Yehudi Menuhin are fine additions to the recorded Bach catalogue. Both records feature George Malcolm, a long-time associate of the conductor, and Simon Preston on the second harpsichord parts of the two double concertos.

These double works come off with less success than the solo concertos, possibly because Malcolm's focused, precise approach to the music is diluted by playing in tandem with Simon. I'm not entirely sure about this, though, because Malcolm's earlier recording of the Bach triple concerto for harpsichord, flute and violin, with the same orchestra and conductor (Angel S-36336) shows excellent ensemble playing.

The solo concertos, however, are a delight. Menuhin takes his usual approach to Baroque music—clean and precise, and it comes off very well. If I had a choice to make between the two records, though, I'd definitely go for the one featuring solo concertos. Aside from having the better recorded sound of the two (the other tends to be a bit strident) the actual music is far more interesting, and a better choice if neither is in your collection at the moment.

These discs usually go for about five dollars, but at this writing, A & A still has all Angel on at $3.29. If you can't get there, Round Records always has a lower price than the big stores.

Dollar Harvest: The Story of the (US) Farm Bureau.
by Samuel R. Berger.
D.C. Health Company

With a foreword by Cesar Chavez, Dollar Harvest: The Story of the (US) Farm Bureau, by Samuel R. Berger, tells the story of how this so-called "farmers'" organization is larger than all other farmers' organizations put together, opposes all types of progressive legislation, operates a $4 billion business empire on the side and, to top it all off, has maintained a tax-exempt status.

The story begins in the 1920's and 30's when agents of the US Department of Agriculture were selling Farm Bureau memberships. Today most farmers belong because they purchase Farm Bureau products. This free-flowing expose piles fact upon fact to show the tactics of this powerful right wing lobby. The list of manoeuvres against migrant labourers is endless.

As one girl remarked after hearing a Farm Bureau speaker at a youth conference, "It's a good thing they are for our side and not the other. They'd have us all brainwashed." Dollar Harvest is free on the eleventh floor of the Roberts Library.

New Chamber Orchestra of Canada gave a highly successful concert at Hart House Sunday night.

Chamber music hits the spot

Last Sunday evening saw the first in the series of concerts by the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada in Hart House's Great Hall, and a more successful concert (both financially and artistically) couldn't have been imagined.

Since the summer, I've been quite literally deluged with promotional material and various pieces of bumpt advertising this concert series. Whoever is running the publicity for this young group deserves an extra hand, because the audience turnout was quite a bit more than expected. At the door, people were being turned away one after another, and at the back of the hall there was standing room for about fifty. This would not be news in the rock or pop fields, or even at the opera. When it comes to chamber music, it is news; there was a time in Toronto not too long ago when a concert of this type would be considered an all-out success if the attendance level reached 60%.

Once inside, the audience was treated to some of the most pleasing Bach ever heard in this city. Leading off the program was the third Brandenburg Concerto, which may have been the weakest number of the evening. Overall, the performance was fine, but in the first and third movements the Orchestra seemed plagued by rhythmic instability, and a marked urge to rush the tempo. The second movement, on the other hand, was improvised by Harpsichordist

Mathieu Duguay in fine fashion, from the adagio movement of Bach's Harpsichord Toccatta BWV916.

Robert Aitken was the soloist in Bach's G Minor Flute Concerto, the second work, and he reminded us once again just why he is regarded as Canada's finest flute virtuoso. His animated style and effortless runs were nothing short of a delight to listen to.

After the intermission, concertmaster Gerard Kantarjarian and assistant concertmaster Andrew Benac got their chance to show off in Bach's Double Violin Concerto. This work is just for the soloists; the orchestra stays almost completely out of the picture, except for the tutti passages. What was left to hear was intelligent and warm, with the two solo violins complementing each other, rather than competing. One point that might be worth mentioning is Kantarjarian's obvious concern with balance; he seems very aware of the problems inherent in leading a thirteen-piece orchestra, and consistently keeps his own violin in the background during those passages when the orchestra plays together. In this particular work, the contrast was particularly marked when he "stepped out" to play his lead parts, and then "faded back" as a member of the ensemble when the solo parts were finished. This is not "wrong"; on the contrary, if he weren't doing it so well, he would have appeared to have dominated the sounds, something he clearly didn't want. If anything, though, he did it a little too much. I felt that his sound should have been in the forefront just a little more, even in the tutti passages. After all, when you're a soloist for a number, why step so far into the background that you disappear?

The last work, Bach's fourth Brandenburg Concerto, brought back Aitken and Nicholas Flore to team up with Kantarjarian. Flore, the Toronto Symphony's principal flautist for the past 21 years blended smoothly with the other soloists and together they gave us a trim, beautiful reading of the score. Whatever balance problems Kantarjarian faced in the previous work (and they weren't all that huge, notwithstanding the previous paragraph) they absented themselves for this number. His solo passages were a model of phrasing and tone.

A plainly thrilled audience brought the orchestra back for Bach's Air on the G String as an encore, bringing the concert to an end. Clearly, they've become an asset to the Canadian music scene—is it too much to hope for a record? At any rate, their next concert at Hart House is on Sunday December 16, and tickets are available now. If the turnout at this concert is any indication, maybe you'd better run for tickets now, because come the evening of the next performance there sure won't be any left.

St. Lawrence Centre's music season gets moving this week with the first in its "Connoisseur Series"—a concert called All Beethoven—All Sun and Smiles. The evening will feature Beethoven's rarely-heard Serenade for Flute, Violin and Viola, several folk songs scored by ol' Ludwig Van, and his Septet for violin, viola, 'cello, bass, clarinet, bassoon and horn. Musicians from the Toronto and Montreal soured jointly buy U of T and York, and there's no charge for this concert at the Concert Hall of the Edward Johnson Building.

Lots of FM this week courtesy of the CBC—Tomorrow, afternoon at 1:30 pm, Benny Goodman and the Guido Basso Orchestra are on tap, recorded live at this year's CNE. Sunday evening at seven you can hear Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" as recorded at this year's Salzburg Festival. An all-star cast is lined up for this performance taped by Radio Salzburg: Teresa Berganza, Elizabeth Harwood, Teresa Stratas, Walter Berry, Zoltan Kelemen, Tom Krause, and Herbert von Karajan

In keeping with this it is appropriate to note that the UC Playhouse is starting a new cabaret style entertainment on Saturday October 27, which if successful will continue in changing form throughout the year. It consists of a loose arrangement of skits and sketches billed as Café Kafka and is free to all. The show begins at 11:00 pm until the dozier hours of the morning. Refreshments will be available.

Meanwhile in a lighter vein, the Backdoor Theatre is next week releasing two original Canadian one act plays under the direction of Gino Marrocco. Gesture of Concern, by David King, looks at a young Riverboat (922-6216) for three days only next week, Monday through Wednesday. Admission is $3.50. Due to an automobile accident last week, John Renbourn, originally scheduled to play this week, will not appear. Dan Hill is the replacement.

Glitter rock gayly rears its head in Toronto again tomorrow when the New York Dolls take over the stage at the Victory Burlesque. The 5 man band will do their sequins and feathers and perform their brand of blistering, searing rock in full drag. Considering the place and the time (4 days before Hallowe'en), you might want to dress up for the occasion yourself—I'm sure others will. Tickets for

The University of Toronto Symphony Orchestra will present its first concert of the season Saturday night in the MacMillan Theatre of the Edward Johnson Bldg.

Symphonies are the featured soloists. Tickets are $4.50 and $3.50, but most are gone now through subscriptions. The box office is worth a try though, beside O'Keefe around Front and Yonge Sts.

Tomorrow night is the first performance of the year of the U of T Symphony Orchestra at the MacMillan Theatre of the Edward Johnson Building. Victor Feldbrill will conduct the concert, and as usual it's a good bet for those who can't manage the high tab at Massey Hall. Also, there's a good chance that several of the members of the Orchestra will end up in the TSO or some other major orchestra within the next few years. Tickets are FREE, but have to be picked up in advance.

Tuesday and Wednesday the Toronto Symphony perform at Massey with a well-balanced program: Weber's overture to "Die Frelschütz" is the opener, followed by three works for violin and orchestra featuring Zvi Zeitlin (recently heard on DG's excellent recording of the Schoenberg violin concerto). Mozart's Adagio in E Major and Rondo in C Major are to be played, followed by Stravinsky's concerto for violin. After the intermission, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5 is slated. The evening's conductor is Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, another performer in the Symphony's "Young Conductors" Festival. $3.00 to $7.50 at the box office.

Thursday at 2:10 pm, Indian Music fans can hear a Rage Concert, featuring Shri Rahol. This is another in a series sponsored by The Variety conducting the Vienna Philharmonic. You can hear a performance on the new Flentrop Organ of the National Arts Centre by Dutch organist Albert de Klerke Wednesday at 8:03 pm. Finally, next Friday, "Opera Time" presents highlights of the new London recording of Puccini's "La Bohème", conducted by Karajan.

Last week's theatre Watsup is guilty of an unintentional slight against the Trinity College Dramatic Society. Having declared that the Firehall Theatre's current production of Kaspar is the first Canadian production in English of the play, it has been rather vehemently brought to my attention that in the Spring of 1971, the TCDS put on a full production of Kaspar in Carwright Hall. Hesitating to get into distinctions between amateur and professional productions (ones you have to pay for) here the issue may rest—Watsup having been partially absolved of unfair spotlighting. A larger point emerges in that the Varsity would very much like to cover the diverse range of theatrical activities now operating on campus, if those concerned would advise us of SHOW-TIME, DATE and PLACE. TCDS, UC Playhouse, Studio Theatre etc. please take note!

man who tries unsuccessfully to rape a girl, and his victim who returns his wallet the next day. The second play The General, by Steve Petch, deals with the plight of a soldier who has heard that the officers whom he serves are systematically picking off their own men. Both plays premiere at the St. Lawrence Centre on October 30, as part of the second International Theatre Festival. They move to the Backdoor Theatre on October 31. Admission is pay-what-you-can but call 961-1505 or 964-1513 for reservations. These plays, taken in conjunction with Clear Light at the Toronto Free Theatre, might lead us to conclude that Canadian playwrights are moving away from repressed emotional violence (Creeps, Leaving Home, Wedding in White) towards a growing interest in physical aggression and atrocity.

Also of interest, Second City opened a new all-Canadian-content show this week called Terminal II. This immediately conjures up some interesting associations! Student tickets are $2.50 but the 11:00 improves are free.

each of the 8 and 11 pm shows are $4.

The Dutch band Focus, led by guitarist Jan Akkerman and organist-flautist Thijs Van Leer are in concert at Massey Hall on Monday. On the same bill is the Spencer Davis Group. They haven't had a successful record since the days when Stevie Winwood was with them and contributed "I'm A Man" and "Gimmie Some Lovin'". Their new album titled "Gluggo" (Vertigo/London; $6.29) is about the worst excuse on vinyl for a comeback. I doubt whether a more uninspired performance, to accompany such pathetic compositions is imaginable. If you want to catch Focus, go an hour later than the 8:30 PM starting time to avoid the Davis Group. Tickets are $4.40 - $6.60.

Applied arts enrollment growing

While enrolment figures for Ontario's universities are up marginally this fall, colleges of applied arts and technology show a 10 per cent increase, Jack McNie, Minister of Colleges and Universities said yesterday.

The 10-per-cent increase in the 22 colleges does not reflect the 7,668 diploma nursing students whose statistics have been transferred to the colleges this year from hospital schools last year.

Universities show a three-per-cent increase with a total full-time undergraduate and graduate enrolment of 138,245 students, 13,305 of whom are graduate students.

The minister said these are preliminary figures and will reflect a revision by the end of the year as some schools, such as U of T, do not have final figures yet.

U of T's enrolment is up about five percent so far with a total of 30,499 full-time students compared to 28,917 as of December, 1972. However, officials at the Office of Statistics and Records indicate there will probably be students who drop out by December 1, so the final 1973 figure will probably be smaller.

Enrolment so far in technical colleges is 42,866 compared to 38,863 last year in programs leading to a diploma or certificate in applied arts, business and technology.

Enrolment in adult training and apprenticeship programs is up one percent to 16,103 compared to 15,935 last year.

Projected enrolment figures in the university office of statistics and records indicate U of T is planning for a "steady state" on the St. George Campus in which student enrolment is projected to be frozen very close to the 1973-74 figures.

Erindale and Scarborough campus however are projected to almost double by 1980. Current Scarborough enrolment is 3,680 and at Erindale there are 2,494 full-time students and 983 part-time.

Province-wide, university enrolment is not making the dramatic increases which characterized the 1960's. While there was a leap of more than 11,000 students — mainly in undergraduate programs — between the 1969-70 academic years, there was a province-wide increase of less than 2,000 between last year and this.

Colleges of Applied Arts and Sciences however, have shown a steady increase of about 4,000 students per year province-wide, showing a trend away from university-oriented education.

Graduate school enrolments in the province have remained almost static over the past four years at close to 13,000 in Ontario.

CLC won't work here

The Canadian Labor Congress drive to organize white collar workers will not be arriving at U of T.

In an interview, Ivor Oram of the Association of Commercial and Technical Employees (ACTE) claimed that union organizing on the U of T campus was "out of our jurisdiction."

He said ACTE had had contact with both students and administrative staff at U of T but not with a view to organizing. It was the students and campus workers who had made contact with this Canadian Labor Congress-affiliated organization and not vice versa.

He asserted that the differences between private and public sector workers were so great that ACTE simply could not see it within its power to organize U of T campus workers. He stressed that finance company clerks were the focus of their organizing drive at the present time.

No Sunday trucking: province

While city politicians plan to ask the provincial government to tighten up its enforcement of Sunday store closing laws under the Lords Day Act, provincial officials are urging the federal Canadian Transport Commission to be strict in the federal body's enforcement of the law's prohibition of trucking on Sunday.

The situation of lower levels of government each asking their respective higher level to better enforce the law developed over the last week in city hall and the CTC hearing in Winnipeg.

City council is already on record as requesting Queen's Park to amend current Sunday legislation to tighten up provision of Sunday closing laws for stores.

Following a lengthy report submitted by police to the public works committee, the committee recommended to council's November 7 meeting that council approach the provincial government to get prosecution requests speeded up.

Police complained that the Ontario Attorney-General's office is refusing more than 50 per cent of all police requests to prosecute stores open on Sunday.

Police also complained about low fines issued by judges, sometimes as low as $10, and the lengthy delays in pursuing permission to lay the charges in the first place.

Meanwhile in Winnipeg, the Ontario government has lawyers along with the Quebec government at a Canadian Transport Commission hearing where trucking firms are applying for permission to transport goods on Sunday between Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal.

The Lords Day Act, a federal statute passed in pre-World War 1 days, generally prohibits commercial enterprises from operating on Sundays unless they provide goods or services of necessity.

The exemption for necessity has become the key issue in the Winnipeg hearings, as provincial lawyers have gotten admissions from the trucking companies, Reimer

Express lines Ltd. and Imperial Roadways Ltd., that the Sunday transportation is not "absolutely necessary."

The public hearing phases of the CTC three-man panel has been completed, with the ruling to be handed down later.

In Toronto, the same question of necessity has posed a problem for local police.

"It is difficult to determine which type of business may be prosecuted," the police report to public works said.

"It is hard to explain to the local merchants why they are being prosecuted, when a precedent was set by Mac's Milk and Beckers in the past defying the Sunday closing laws."

Another gripe of police: "Because of the general attitude of the public and ambiguity of the act itself, police action is only instituted after complaints have been received."

One big happy family

Oh-h-h.....

Not too many people bother to go to Governing Council meetings, including a few governors. But maybe they aren't so dumb.

The Varsity's sleuth photographer sneaked into the last one to capture the truth of what happens. This meeting was billed as "The Big One."

Even the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star were there to cover council's intense and searching debate and the climactic vote on the campus' biggest burning issue:

Shall the university sell 188 Yonge Street to the Fairview

Corp.? Dear old Naomi Bilton had willed the property to the university with the provision that it never be sold to the Eaton Company or any representative of the Eaton Co.

That mean old Timothy Eaton had argued with her father over access to their Yonge Street laneway 100 years ago, and Naomi was going to fight it from the grave, if necessary.

Now that Fairview Corp. want to buy the property and use it for (heavens to high-rises) an Eaton's shopping centre.

Would council sell out? Would the good triumph over evil?

Student governor Howie Levitt (above) rises to the occasion amid the startled yawns of two fellow governors (right), one of whom is more interested in the spectators than Levitt.

Photographs by John Rak

Ralph Campbell, long remembered for the Campbell report on discipline, doesn't say very much, because his face (when it can be seen) says more.

.....brother..

Would Naomi Bilton turn over in her grave? This meeting of governing council had the makings of a power-packed thriller.

Trouble is, it bombed out. Nary a word was spoken as governors hummed and hawed their way through the routine motions and gobbledygook. With the patience of Job, they dredged their way through the agenda, and woke up only long enough to say, "Aye," to 188 Yonge and fell back into semi-consciousness.

There was a real winner, however: bureaucratic obfuscation.

While lowly governors natter, Chairman Malim Harding naps in the shadow of his nibs, Dr. John, as vice-chairman William Harris prepares to ponder the prodigious prose of decision-making

. . . however, when it's time to vote on 188 Yonge, the boys in the club are bright-eyed and bushy-tailed to make sure everything goes well for those wonderful folks at Fairview Corp.

PHE leads in Mullock race, New sweeps second division

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

New chopped Forestry into kindling wood last Friday afternoon as they won 19-0. Because of the wet weather, the game resembled the 1920's style of football (two bucks and a kick, or 'the welfare mother's lament').

New's ecological assault was led by Lawrence Coleman. He was released from his cage shortly before game time and promptly scored two touchdowns and ate three forest-dwelling natives. Saikely tacitly approved this savage behavior by adding two field-goals.

Out-numbered and out-weighted, the Forestry team started the game off badly by appearing on the field. However, they held off New until the 2nd quarter when Saikely kicked a lame-duck field goal from the 35 (but as they say about bank employees, "they all count").

New scored again on a punt return as Coleman ran a reverse 54 yards for a TD. Startled by Coleman's flapping garments, New missionaries missed the conversion attempt.

Later New added another saikely-looking field-goal to increase their conspicuously consumptive lead.

With 2 minutes left in the half, Forestry's QB Clarke hit Sisson in the unheated flat which he rented for 27 yards. However, they were evicted when New sent around some building inspectors who found a loose fumble and kept it. (Forestry is often the victim of such grafting.)

New's QB Hess then completed a 40 yard pass (the Deep Throat fly pattern) to Coleman who zippered into the endzone. Penalties nullified the play but Coleman, who just doesn't know when he's been licked, ran the same play again successfully for a TD which left several amazed cheerleaders gasping completely.

By the 4th quarter, several grand injuries (part of the democratic process) further weakened Forestry's life-support systems. New's Jack Jung, no Freudian he, slipped on the ground. This drove his eyeglasses deep into his unconscious which created a terrible spectacle indeed.

The Ivey-covered college contented themselves with another field goal and single in the final dispirited (only 12 % proof) minutes.

Two spectators successfully detached themselves from their intellects and spent the afternoon just singing in the rain.

Trinity Longhorns stampeded through Forestry 19-0. Poulos (2 TD) and Ferris (1) led the prime blue-bloods in their search for better pastureland.

After Trinity recovered a fumble near the For goal, Poulos sawed through from the two for the first TD.

Trin scored another TD when they moved from their own 10 to the endzone in three plays. Their explosive QB Wright delivered 2 missiles to the Poulos bomb squad for the major.

In the 3rd quarter, Ferris wheeled past 2 defenders (who only saw dust) to give Trin their final 19-0 margin. New clinched the II Division title, sandblasting UC 31-24.

On the 4th play of the game, New felt like scoring as Newfelt scored from the 4 on a sweep. UC responded to such linguistic knavery by grinding down to the two, whereupon a sprightly Young leaped for six.

Coleman (remember him?) washed into the endzone behind a tidal wave of blockers. On the last play of the half, Saikely added a feverish field-goal to bequeath New with a 17-6 lead.

In the third quarter UC's split-end MacGillivray gave a head and shoulders fake to a defender for a TD which narrowed the lead. However, on the subsequent kick-off Coleman romped 60 yards for another TD.

MacGillivray replied patriotically (oh say can you see that split-end again?) with a TD and team-mate Holy Romanowicz Empire fell into the endzone with another with only 40 seconds left. Down 7 points UC recovered their short kickoff but Chicoline preserved it for New, intercepting with time expired.

In other action a report mailed via Winnipeg showed New (Coleman, who else, two TD's Schneider 1 TD and Saikely a convert) scuttled Scarborough's Fairest (Henderson 1 TD, Ellis convert) 19-7.

PHE trampled the hapless plumbers 22-0 on Curran's two majors and a single, Zaremba's six, Nedoshytko's two converts and Ross's single. The jocks itched to get this one.

The difference was along the line where St. Mikes had more hair brow to brow. Coach "Orph" had his middle guard stick Vic's centre on long snaps which precipitated a flurry of misguided returns. Also crucial to SMC's success was the ability of corner linebackers "Beefier" Muir and Nick Desimini to turn Vic's sprint backs Hotrum and Johnson in.

The trend developed early as Desimini cancelled Johnson's attempt at the halfback option. Johnson turned chicken and laid an egg. St. Mikes recovering.

Vic appeared ready to pull it out when QB Tim Weichel hit Mike Cork from 30 yards out, "Hot Rod" Hotrum converting. After some hesitation and confusion, Vic then chose to gamble on third down and lost.

All the intangibles swung to SMC. Romas Kriavicius took the ball and would not be denied. He broke five tackles going forty yards for the score in the best run from scrimmage this year. Joe Liscio converted.

"Terror" Poulos picked off a deflected pro pass to set up Hotrum's field goal to leave Vic ahead 10-7 at the half.

Penalties to the micks created Vic's longest sustained drive but they failed to score. Finally Larry Cline tied it up again for the micks with a 70 yard dash around left end that Liscio translated into a field goal.

The winner was a fumbled punt, hastily gathered in by "Scramblin'" Norm Dannen. Somehow it was anticlimactic. St. Mikes had won it in the trenches long before the score keeper caught up.

By DAVE BAKER

Interfaculty football has finally found some kind of perspective by which to measure itself. The SMC coach has unquestionably reached the poignant depths of "rah rah" with his sideline banter.

His enraptured automations look hypnotically into his jaded eyes as he imprecates. "Let's think out there," then they go out and hit somebody.

The return of "The Hawk" was marred slightly by the fact that Vic lost 16-10, but Ron Gray showed he remains one of the few interfac tacklers to hit low and hard, one-on-one. For Vic he represents the last lingering vestige from the bygone age of Beale and the awesomes.

The Play-off Positions

In the first division the top team gets a first round bye to play the winner of the second-third clash. PHE has already clinched first, and Engineers are winless; so Vic and SMC will be meeting, regardless of the rest of the season.

In the second division the top four go into the play-offs, with first and fourth and second and third meeting. New has four straight wins to guarantee a place while Forestry is out with four losses. UC is also in with two wins and a tie.

Unless Scarborough can beat both Meds and Forestry, Trin and Meds will be the other two finalists, with Trinity likely to be New's first victims.

S. African mission: arms deal charged

While a Toronto-based research group claims three of the eight companies participating in Ontario's trade mission to South Africa this week deal in military products, departmental officials in the government expressed concern over threats the government has received about the mission.

Controversy surrounding the trade mission had reached the point by late Friday that a senior official in the ministry of industry and tourism admitted they have had "several threatening phone calls. We've had to take measures to screen these phone calls."

The government official heading the mission scheduled to leave Wednesday, Michael Cooper-Slipper, has been the recipient of some of these calls, which has led to a tightening of security.

Meanwhile, the Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Portugal's African Colonies (TCLPAC) said in a release that Perfection Automotive Products (Windsor) Ltd., McPhar Geophysics Ltd. of Toronto, and Ward Leonard of Canada Ltd. of Scarborough "are companies that deal in military products."

A spokesman for TCLPAC said that neither the government nor the companies have said precisely which products the individual firms plan on buying or selling in South Africa, but that the past record of the three firms leads them to question what the companies plan on doing.

Two of the firms are subsidiaries of foreign corporations.

Ward Leonard is 98.8 per cent owned by US interests and is listed in the Canadian Defence Commodity Producers catalogue published by the Canadian federal government "and made available to other governments such as that of South Africa," TCLPAC said.

McPhar Geophysics is a subsidiary of Canadian Industries Limited (CIL) which is 73.4 per cent owned by the British firm, Imperial Chemical Industries (ICI). McPhar is acknowledged by the federal department of industry, trade and commerce to have received unclassified contracts under Canada-US production sharing arrangements for defence equipment destined for the US military.

CIL's parent firm, ICI, has a 42.5 per cent holding the AE & CI, South Africa's second largest industrial company which includes munitions factories among its operations.

Other firms on the trade mission include Seco Tool Co. Ltd. of Toronto, Waldec of Canada Ltd. in Rexdale, T. Scan Ltd. of Scarborough, Farmatic Automatic Feeding Ltd. of Gorrie, Northern Stag Industries Ltd. of Rockwood.

Doug Jure, administrative assistant to Industry and Tourism Minister Claude Bennett, said that 75 firms have approached the provincial ministry to participate in the trade mission.

"We've had to turn them away at the doors, literally," Jure said in an interview, adding that there has been tremendous pressure put on the ministry for the trade mission from a number of Ontario businesses.

He said that the "South Africans are just pleased as hell" that "the Canadians are coming."

Jure responded to the charges of defence goods being sold, saying that, "Wallpaper of the officer's mess is the closest we're coming to strategic goods."

The Ontario government is spending in excess of $12,000 to cover the return air fares of the company executives going on the mission. Jure said, however, that the firms have to cover their own expenses in South Africa, but that they would have the facilities of the Canadian federal government's trade mission in Johannesburg.

Canadian trade to South Africa, most of which comes from Ontario, Jure said, amounts to about one per cent of South Africa's imports. The US and Britain are responsible for about 21 per cent and 17 per cent respectively.

While Canadian exports to the country have dropped to $42.5 million in 1972 from $104 million in 1970, imports into Canada during the same period have risen to $58.9 million from $45.7 million.

The eight companies travelling to South Africa will be looking for sales in a number of fields, including: pharmaceuticals, tools, car parts, computer equipment, farm implements and machinery, mining exploration equipment, commercial fishing equipment, and studio lighting control equipment.

Last year, Ontario exports included: wheat, non-metallic minerals, lumber, wood pulp, newsprint, reproduction paper, plastic film and sheet, trucks and chassis under 6,000 lbs, and parts and accessories for motor vehicles.

Jure had a simple description for the job of the industry department! "This is the bucks ministry."

Women at City Hall demanded freedom for Dr. Morgentaler

150 attend Morgentaler demo

By MARILYN EMERSON

About 150 women marched from OISE to city hall Saturday to protest the criminal charges laid against Dr. Henry Morgentaler.

It was a peaceful demonstration with the emphasis on freedom for Dr. Morgentaler and his partner Dr. Yvan Macchabee and abortion rights for all women.

The demonstration was part of the Ontario Conference on Women and was preceded by a special session on the defense of Dr. Morgentaler.

Morgentaler, a Montreal physician, has been charged under the Criminal Code on counts of performing illegal abortions. If convicted, Dr. Morgentaler is liable to imprisonment for life. On October 18, his trial began on one of the thirteen charges.

All of the speakers at the session were uniform in their belief that the Morgentaler issue is a political one. Lorna Grant, a cross-country co-ordinator for the defense stated that the issue was not one of illegal abortion but "an all out attack on women's rights".

Grant stated the case of Dr. Morgentaler is made secure by the upheaval of the US abortion laws and the support of 5,000 Canadian women.

Grant suggested that the attack and charges against Dr. Morgentaler "really means a calculated political attack." She asked why the government did not "go after the 'quacks' who continue to do their business." Grant sees "denying woman abortion" as the real crime here and contends that Dr. Morgentaler issue is a "test case."

According to Grant, a conviction would mean a set back for the women's movement and an opening of the doors to Birthright, an anti-abortion group. It would also imply a stricter interpretation of the laws regarding abortion.

The broad implications of the case, Grant said, would be a "low blow to the woman's movements" and "a serious defeat for feminism." In response to her own question "what can we do?", she suggested women "organize, inform and mobilize."

In conclusion Grant appealed for active support. "The public must come up with reasons for defense." Citing local defense committees Grant implored that concerned persons contact them.

"The possibilities for the case are yet to be discovered."

Dr. Morgentaler is risking his future for us, she said. We owe it to him to rally to his defense.

Bkbara Stewart from the U of T's Women's Committee stated "this is a political issue" and "the reason for the case is an attack on women's movement." She stated the objection to the action of Dr. Morgentaler is that he is "doing a service for women." The conditions of his bail, she said, were that he would not talk of his cause.

Stewart considers that student women are all important in the struggle. "They have the facilities" for furthering the movement. The university must provide "rooms money and speakers." She hopes that by using the facilities of the student university women will "set an example and gain followers."

Patrice Merrin of the Toronto Defense Committee and Toronto's Planned Parenthood stated that Dr. Morgentaler is being prosecuted because "he is acting on behalf of freedom for women, for individuals." Merrin sees the church as the second greatest power structure behind the offense. She cited a slogan on a church brochure reading: "Please God remove the scourge of abortion from this land."

From the Montreal Defense Committee, Margaret Manwaring reported on the development of the case in Montreal. One of the biggest problems they face now is propaganda being passed by anti-abortion groups.

Leaflets not only distort the facts of the case, but they propose ludicrous suggestions such as: "Dr. Morgentaler is a Jew trying to wipe out the Quebec population."

Blacks slam mission

The provincial government's trade mission to South Africa has brought a storm of scathing criticism directed at the government by representatives of Toronto's black community.

An attempt by Ed Clarke, chairman of the National Black Coalition, to bring a deputation of black leaders to meet with Industry and Tourism Minister Claude Bennett, has met with little success as ministry officials have refused to set up an appointment.

"The provincial government says this segment of society has no rights to redress of grievances," Clarke said.

"This compares to the South African government where blacks have no rights."

Mel Thompson, president of the Canadian-Jamaica Association, says in an editorial in the black newspaper, Contrast:

"When a government openly and officially consents to a regime that has been found guilty of various atrocities against all people who are not considered white, that government is as guilty of racism in spite of the preten-sions at home.

"Its whole program of human rights becomes suspect."

Clarke is especially upset by the government's protests that there are no arms shipments involved in the trade mission.

Clarke was the only black person among five demonstrators who conferred with Bennett, following a demonstration Thursday.

Clarke says that at the conclusion of their talk, Bennett promised that he would meet with leaders of the black community to discuss the trade mission.

The ministry, however, is now refusing to meet with such a deputation claiming that it has already met with Clarke.

Clarke contends however, that the ministry should meet with a black deputation as well as whatever white groups wish to meet with him.

"The government is showing callous disregard for the 100,000 black people of Ontario," Clarke said. "It looks like we're going to have to have demonstrations in front of Queen's Park this week."

In our review of Bruce Cockburn's concert (Friday Oct. 26) a quote from his song "Save the Children" was jumbled by a typographical error. The verse should read: sea swells - illusion is queen - in the shallow graves of experience time-centred - grave silence hangs over the stars - graven image hanging in time - while the earth unwinds.

In our story about Karma retailers attempting to rent the Meat and Potatoes building (Friday Oct. 26), there was not a distinction as to which Karma Co-op was involved. Howard Kaplan, a board member of Karma I located on Dupont Street, says that his Karma I Co-op was not involved nor is John Percy a spokesman for his group. He said there is a Karma II located in the Don Vale in Toronto's east end, of which Percy has been a member.

The little red machine

Nixon's the one for Ontario Libs

In a less than solid display of solidarity, Robert Nixon managed yesterday to hang on to his job as top cheese in the Ontario Liberal Party.

Nixon won on the third ballot over Norm Cafik, by a vote of 992 to 675. However, everyone seemed to be more concerned with the fact that over 400 delegates at the convention hadn't bothered to vote.

In his acceptance speech, Nixon acknowledged that there had been division in the party (he had expected to win on the first ballot). But he pledged to take the principles and philosophy of Liberalism to the people of Ontario anew. What these principles actually were, he didn't spell out.

Cafik, who sounds like Hubert Humphrey and looks like a lathing contractor, ran much stronger than was expected. He pledged that he would do everything he could to help the Liberals to power in Ontario.

Poor old Donald Deacon only got a standing ovation from the delegates, for a campaign which cost him 60 thousand dollars. That's 15 dollars per delegate.

High point of the afternoon's proceedings was U of T History Professor Des Morton's class analysis of the decline of liberalism. Morton's CBC appearance drew large numbers of people to the television sets in the Royal York's lobby, and away from the convention floor.

CMHA helps 'unmanageable' kids

By DAVID SIMMONDS

It can be a harrowing experience for a young Indian child from Red Lake, Ont., to find himself in a training school in Sudbury.

Yet this happens frequently, to children as young as seven years old. A child can be declared "unmanageable" by his parents, and will become a ward of the province, which usually involves going to a training school.

Connie Mercer of the Canadian Mental Health Association, is trying to change all that. She is responsible for setting up 12 "group houses" in communities throughout the province, especially in Northern Ontario.

The aim of the project is to provide a "home" environment for children who are unable to live at home for one reason or another, but who would otherwise be forced into the barbarity of an institution.

As Mercer points out, many children have not even broken a law when they are sent away. But once they are put into the schools, their rate of recidivism (relapse) becomes something near 65 to 85 per cent. In other words, if there wasn't a problem before, the school tends to ensure that there is afterwards.

The project was initiated two years ago by the Ontario department of corrections, and turned over to the Canadian Mental Health Association (CMHA) for administration. The cost of running the homes is 13 dollars per child per day, which compared to a cost of between 26 and 36 dollars in a training school. Nevertheless, Mercer finds herself on an "incredibly limited" budget.

She feels that the houses will perform a basic function which the training schools cannot. That is, they attempt to reintegrate the child with the community. The eventual aim is to allow the child to return to his family, although this is not always possible.

While living at the homes, children are encouraged to visit their families, but if it proves traumatic, they still have the group home to return to.

Each of the 12 homes will be administered by a community board, which Mercer hopes will ensure an ongoing involvement between the community and the children. She suggests that in the past people have reacted in a stereotyped manner: the children have been labelled 'delinquent' and put out of sight and out of mind.

Further, says Mercer, people are just plain scared. While they may endorse the concept of a group home, they would sooner see it out in the countryside than smack in the middle of their own community.

This fear has already surfaced in Stratford, where local residents are taking CMHA to court in a bid to prevent the operation of the home.

Although all the homes are slightly different, the children are all between the ages of 12 and 17 years. Usually, there is a ratio of about 8 children to 3 staff members in a given home.

There are two such homes in Toronto. One provides for older working boys, and the other for school age girls. The latter house is a cosy slightly untidy place, with lots of ashtrays and scratched records, but one which could be definitely called home. Even the cat is hospitable.

The problem for the staff, says Mercer, is to participate fully in a casual, but regulated environment. "Really exceptional people" are required.

Mercer said she needs staff for the girls home in Toronto, but also for other homes in the province. Connie emphasizes that while there are no formal requirements of applicants, she is looking for older, experienced people who get along with children, and who are prepared to take the responsibility of complete involvement.

TA union drive needs 200 recruits

By DICK BROWN

A month-long drive to recruit the last 200 graduate assistants needed to certify the Graduate Assistants Association is underway.

Michael O'Keefe, chairman of the GAA, said the push is also aimed at those undergraduates who do the same work as their graduate counterparts.

To be certified as the collective bargaining agent for the approximately 2,000 assistants at U of T, 35 per cent, or about 700, have to be signed up. So far about a quarter have signed with the GAA since September, O'Keefe said.

Once the union signs up 35 per cent, a vote of 50 per cent plus one is required by the assistants before bargaining with the university can take place.

Even with the organizing drive still going on, the GAA has already started putting up a fight for graduate assistants. Lawyer Martin Levinson has taken the GAA's claim for back vacation pay, required under the Ontario Employment Standards Act, to the provincial government for a ruling, and O'Keefe is optimistic for a decision favorable to students.

The act stipulates that an employee must receive vacation pay at a rate of two per cent per year of his wages. O'Keefe says the university has not done this for years.

O'Keefe says the GAA is now getting recruiters in each department to sign up graduate assistants, including teaching assistants, markers, tutors, research assistants, demonstrators and instructors.

The drive also includes a Saturday night party, poster, a "massive" telephone campaign, and a speaking tour November 14-15 by the president of graduate assistant association from the University of Windsor - the only certified association in Canada.

The Windsor association has won a uniform wage of $2,400 per year, maximum allowable by law, a grievance procedure, and a voice in departmental hiring committees.

U of T assistants have an average wage of less than $1,000 per year, and they do more than 40 per cent of the undergraduate teaching, according to the GAA.

O'Keefe reports some of the GAA's best response from Engineering, where wages are the lowest. Average incomes in other departments, such as Physical and Life sciences are as low as $800, compared to $1,800 for Humanities and $1,250 for Social Sciences.

In some departments, assistants are expected to take on teaching and marking work at no pay, and many undergraduates only receive half the wages as their graduate equivalents for the same work.

One of the aims of the GAA is to provide standard wages based on an accurate estimate of the time required to fulfill teaching and other duties rather than the current system of "contact hours" which does not take into account preparation time.

This year's effort represents a marked change from a similar effort a year ago to organize assistants. That attempt failed last June mainly because of mistakes made in trying to meet Ontario Labor Relations Board standards.

New daycare

The university administration is considering "two or three" spots as possible alternatives to the planned U of T daycare center that was to be placed in the meteorological building on Devonshire Place now illegally occupied by the Campus Co-op Daycare Centre for over-tuos.

The U of T center was to be established there contingent upon the Co-op center being given a new home in one of the Innis Resident Co-op buildings on Sussex St. But the Innis project has slowed to a crawl, and Conway admitted "it would be almost a year before a permanent home could be offered."

Conway said the university is not abandoning the Devonshire site, but, while awaiting a resolution of Innis' problems, will be looking at possible new sites. All of these, she said "would necessitate the relocation of some university services", and the university is looking for "the most feasible."

Throat trial

Three U of T students charged with "exposing an obscene movie to public view" are to have a date for their trial set at a Nov. 13 court appearance, following a routine remand in court Friday.

The three are charged in connection with the October 11 showing of the film Deep Throat at the Medical Sciences Auditorium.

Defence lawyer Clayton Ruby, who is representing two of the students, said he expects the trial to take place sometime in January or February.

The Friday court appearance was only to set a trial date, and no plea was entered by the accused, Ruby said.

The charges were laid following a raid by Metro Toronto plainclothes police, who also confiscated the film. While Deep Throat has been ruled obscene in some US court districts, there has not been a ruling on the film in any Canadian court yet, Ruby said.

Ruby said he is still looking for persons who were at the showing of the film who might be able to help the defence, although he added that no one who contacts his office (964-9664) is under any obligation.

Charged in the incident are: Taras Babiak, Lawrence Welbroad, UC SAC rep; and David Galbraith, SAC education commissioner.

War zone restored

Just south of the St. George campus is a former battleground of the citizen's movement in Toronto. Beverly Street has been slated for changes both by the police department's proposal for a new 52 division headquarters and Ontario Hydro's massive re-development project.

Both projects are now not what they were originally proposed.

Hydro has sold the block bounded by Beverly, Baldwin, Cecil and Henry Streets to the Ontario Housing Corporation (OHC).

The OHC is now planning to renovate 26 of 48 existing houses and erect an L-shaped building three and a half storeys high with 133 housing units and 8,500 square feet of commercial space.

While the proposal is not the 108-unit development proposed by the Hydro Block Working Committee, it is a far cry from the block busting and demolition approach used by Hydro which raised howls from citizens groups two years ago.

The $3.5 million project proposed by OHC also included a rejection of a 173-unit development, which Revenue Minister Alan Grossman termed "out of scale with the neighborhood."

Hydro's original idea had been to tear down the entire 2.2-acre block to build a highrise switching and transformer station in the predominantly residential area.

Currently only 22 of the 48 houses are occupied with the rest having been boarded up following Hydro's efforts to blockbust the block. The new proposal still requires approval from city hall to change certain zoning regulations.

Meanwhile, further on down Beverly Street, the debate over a new 52 division police station is working its way through various municipal layers of government.

After no consultation with local residents, the Metro Police commission announced plans for a new building at the corner of Beverly and Dundas about two years ago.

After strong citizen and resident protests, Toronto City Council got into the act. Their most recent move was urging Metro Council to restore the Stewart Building, the current 52 division headquarters on College Street west of University Avenue.

Social-democratic PQ no answer for workers

Today's Quebec election is likely to see the return of the Liberal party to power with a reduced majority. However, it's not at all inconceivable that the Parti Quebecois could form the official opposition with anywhere from 15 to 30 seats in the National Assembly.

Quebec's three large trade unions — the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU), the Quebec Federation of Labor (QFL), and the Quebec Teachers Federation (QTF) — are not officially supporting any political party in today's election. But of the four contending political parties, there are indications that most of the rank and file union members have a definite preference for the Parti Quebecois, viewing it as the best of an unimpressive lot.

And, the three major unions are united on one point — their opposition to the present Bourassa government. (CNTU) president Marcel Pepin considers the present Liberal regime to be extraordinarily anti-labor, and even, as he sees it, dangerously close to supporting a 'fascist' position.

QFL president Louis Laberge also realizes that the Parti Quebecois isn't a worker's party, but, like most other unionists, he considers a vote for the PQ to be an initial step in the struggle to form a Quebec labor party where there is only a movement now. For with the PQ and an independent Quebec most labor leaders feel the unions could unite in a common party with the goal of a socialist Quebec.

And, although the three union leaders and their numerous supporters (over 35 per cent of Quebec's labor force is unionized) haven't directly come out in support of the PQ, there are several union members or union-affiliated candidates running under the PQ banner in today's election campaign. The unions undoubtedly realize PQ leader Rene Levesque's position.

Levesque is extremely touchy when it comes to union-party links. Quebec's labor unions are not liked by the public and Levesque's party must gain the support of the middle class voters if it is to have any chance of forming a government now or in 1975-76.

However, as matters now stand, there are over a dozen union-affiliated PQ candidates in today's election, including former QTF vice-president (1967-71) Mathias Roux, and Guy Bisillon. Therefore, although the union members and their leaders avoid any overt support for the social democratic PQ, they are supporting the party through the representatives they have running as PQ candidates. Organized labor in Quebec obviously views the PQ as one interim means to an end.

As PQ financial critic Guy Joron remarked recently in Quebec-Press: "Our program isn't that of a socialist party. We like to think of it as sort of an advanced social democratic platform, if you like. It can, however, open the way to the establishment of socialism, if that's what the Quebecois eventually choose. If you take the first step, it will make the road to socialism all the more easy."

Rene Levesque claims that the PQ has an "immense affinity toward the workers who form 80 per cent of Quebec's population." But he adds that the PQ is, above all, "closest to those workers who are weakest — the ones that aren't protected by any union."

Robert Burns, a long standing CNTU supporter and now member of the National Assembly from the working-class riding of Maisonneuve was the PQ's labor critic during the last session of the National Assembly. He believes that there do exist certain fundamental "workers' rights that at present aren't negotiated. Burns feels these rights have to be protected, even if a union doesn't exist in a certain industry.

Key to any PQ program (should the party be elected) is the introduction of sectoral bargaining. (Alone of the four main parties the PQ advocates this form of collective bargaining.) But "participation" is the keystone to the PQ's labor policy. It does not envisage a party of workers, but rather worker co-operation in a reformist government along with other groups in Quebec society. (This is, obviously, no solution for Quebec's militant trade unions.)

And since the PQ feels that, at present, labor is not an 'integral component' of Quebec society, in that it is not equipped to bargain for its rights, the party probably thinks its reformist position is quite progressive. But the union leaders would likely take exception to this attitude.

In labor policy the PQ would seek to co-opt the unions and other unorganized working class people to legitimize and institutionalize the labor movement. Where possible, businesses would be partially or wholly managed by local workers' committees, through a system referred to as 'cogestion' (co-management) or "autogestion" (self-management). The state would provide economic specialists to these committees who would help them gradually take over management duties' regional centres staffed mainly by union and government personnel would help with the general process of consultation. And the sectoral negotiations would be tripartite exercises in co-operative economic planning involving labor, management and the state, with the PQ turning the labor leadership into the state's manpower consultants.

Although that is the PQ's overall plan, the party's program also advocates various piece meal measures designed to appease the workers in the short run: the rights of seniority, a grievance procedure, protection against technological changes, a 40-hour work week with a maximum of eight hours overtime at time and a-half, at least four weeks of vacation pay each year, maternity leave, and retirement at the age of 55 for those who want it. To safeguard workers from technological changes the PQ wishes to see an initial warning from companies at least six months ahead of the changes, and severe sanctions against businesses which don't conform to the law. (Although these are not the only reforms proposed by the PQ they do indicate the party's direction with respect to labor policy, and how much labor can expect from a social democratic government.)

PQ MNA Robert Burns has remarked that "the PQ is not a party of workers, and it's not a party of labor politics, linked to unions. I think all the same that it's dedicated more than all the other parties together to the interests of the workers. I don't feel too out of sorts in going part of the way (toward socialism) with the PQ. Afterwards, we'll see..."

And Burns' comments sum up the social democratic position of the PQ. One might expect Quebec labor to have some hesitation and cynicism about embracing too vigorously such a party, judging from what social democracy has meant to other areas of organized labor in Canada.

In fact, the PQ does appear to have a middle-class, petit bourgeois (in the Marxist sense) composition for the most part, although it has managed to broaden its base of support considerably over the past three and one-half years. Until meaningful statistics are gathered it's almost impossible to determine the class composition of the PQ.

So, as bleak as the political situation is, we can only hope that the PQ gains enough support to become the official opposition and thereby become a political force for the Liberal party to contend with. But any PQ gains will only be small steps to a socialist, independent Quebec, and PQ is obviously little more than a social democratic party, and it can only carry Quebec forward to a certain stage. The PQ might bring independence but it certainly won't usher in a socialist Quebec.

I would like to register a sharp protest against The Varsity's refusal to cover campus meetings on the war in the Mid-East. The significance of this war in terms of world peace and the concerns of people on this campus certainly makes such coverage newsworthy.

More important, in the context of the pro-Zionist hysteria which characterizes the standard press on this issue, such a position of the part of The Varsity is tantamount to a blackout of the anti-Zionist view in one of the few places where it can receive an equal hearing.

The Varsity has not passed the test of being able to go beyond (left chic.)

Attacks on faculty serve reactionaries

The recent SAC publication "Faculty Funnies" makes a sour impression on my generation that lived through the Hitler and McCarthy periods. It is permeated by the anti-intellectualism, misrepresentation, demagoguery, and incitement to hatred that characterized the gutter literature of the anti-semites, political bigots, and organizers of programs against culture. Its main thrusts are against tenure and co-operation between faculty and students. Tenure was won in a very long struggle as a shield against firings for political and social radicalism (the conservatives have never needed it), and its elimination would be used by those who hold the real power (not the professors or administrators, but the establishment that controls all the institutions in our society). The very few professors who fit the caricature of the SAC cartoonist are the darlings of the establishment and would be discomfited in no way. It is the liberal majority of faculty and students who would suffer. The unity of the faculty in maintaining high standards for admission to tenure is essential to maintaining the modest amount of freedom that is allowed. Irresponsible attacks on the faculty and on tenure serve the interests of the most reactionary elements in society and in the university. They close the only revenue to development of a more democratic university — cooperation between faculty and students in achieving faculty — student control of university policies.

Canadian trade helps apartheid

The Ontario Government's plan to send a provincial trade mission to South Africa must not be allowed to come to fruition. Canadian trade and investment in South Africa directly support the Apartheid Regime. It is a falsehood to say as the provincial government does, that trade is impartial to the condition of the Black population in South Africa. In fact it is only through continued trade with the outside world that the Apartheid Regime can maintain and further consolidate its control over its Black and Coloured population. It is further a falsehood to contend that Canadian investment ameliorates the conditions of South African Blacks by introducing a more considerate "Canadian" element into the South African context. In reality Canadian corporations in South Africa must conform to the institutionalized racism of South African law or they would not be allowed to exist there at all. Major Canadian corporations in South Africa all conform to racially defined job classification by law. Further, such Canadian Corporations as Falconbridge, Massey-Ferguson, and Alcan all pay Black workers in South Africa well below whites and pay a majority of their Black workers well below the Poverty Datum Line (the minimum level of above-starvation existence).

We the undersigned cannot allow to pass uncriticized this act by the Ontario provincial government which will directly support the institutionalized racism of the white minority government in South Africa. Further we call on all those critical of the Ontario Government's policy regarding the sending of a trade mission to South Africa to sign this letter as well as to make their voices heard through other appropriate channels.

Cover engineers

As an arts student who believes in solidarity with our United Farmworker brethren, I should like to protest in the strongest possible terms the incredible behaviour which I witnessed last week as a group of Engineers sold California grapes and Kraft and Dare products on this campus. The fact that these individuals were selling these forbidden products was bad enough, but what was even worse were the arts students who crowded around to purchase the tainted goods. Within a very brief time, they had sold all the products to these students who have allegedly pledged solidarity with the working class. As the campus newspaper, I feel that The Varsity has a duty to keep tabs on such activities. The Varsity should consider assigning reporters to follow the activities of the Engineers and report their childish and anti-revolutionary actions to the campus at large. Viva la revolution!

Blacklisted movie will be shown to help Artistic

The film "Salt of the Earth" will be shown Tuesday evening at 8 pm in the Medical Sciences Auditorium. The event is being sponsored by the Artistic Woodworking Strike Support Committee in order to raise money for the union strike fund.

The strike by Local 570 of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union of the Artistic Woodworking Company began August 21 at the company's two North York plants. To date, over 70 picketers have been arrested by police as they daily break up picket lines to allow carloads of non-striking employees and scabs to enter the company's Densley Avenue plant.

"Salt of the Earth" was made in the early fifties and concerns the union organizing efforts of the New Mexican zinc miners. The filmmakers were later blacklisted by Hollywood during the McCarthy period.

The Artistic strike fund pays strike pay of $45 a week to the strikers. The union has asked for the support of students, concerned citizens, and other workers in maintaining its picket line at 23 Densley Avenue (four blocks north of Eglinton off Keele Street). The support is needed every morning between 6:30 and 7:30.

big strikes that spread throughout the population including peasants (largely rural landless workers) and students.

Before Allende was elected president of Chile, the government was led by Eduardo Frei, a figure in Kennedy's image, who promised to nationalize the copper industry and bring land reforms. Chile bought 51 per cent of the shares in large firms, but control still remained in American imperialist hands. Likewise, land reform was limited and included compensation of big land owners.

General Augusto Pinochet seized power in Chile.

Workers continued to agitate for basic reforms. The years preceding Allende's administration were very turbulent.

In November 1967 a nationwide strike protested anti-strike legislation and opposed wage cuts as an inflation control. Chilean troops broke the strike. In March 1969 anti-riot police prevented farmworkers from settling land, killing nine. In August 1970 a larger peasant movement seized land. This time Frei dared not send in troops. Prices soared, unemployment rose, housing shortages grew more critical.

Allende was put in power by Chilean capitalism as a roadblock to revolution. Allende was aligned with the liberal wing of the ruling class (represented by the Christian Democrats) at odds with the conservative wing (the Nationalist Party). The liberals felt Allende could preserve the existing system, and its close links with US imperialism, by instituting "socialist" reforms.

Allende's brand of socialism found eager admirers in the US State Department: "Not only all the old institutions but also all the non-socialist forces in Chile remain intact."

Unfortunately for the bourgeoisie, labour unrest continued under Allende. In August 1971 work stoppages and plant occupations took place throughout Chile, and included the huge El Salvador and Chuquibambilla copper mines. Also in 1971, peasants seized land while farmworkers fought for higher wages. Allende sent in troops and police several times, although he was often content to issue decrees and statements while jailing the leaders of the protests. Allende never claimed to have established "socialism", although he was known as a "Marxist", and frequently reminded right-wing critics that capitalism prospered in Chile.

Allende dismissed all protests as CIA inspired. Fernanda Navarro, Mrs. Allende's press secretary who was in Toronto recently, agreed with this sentiment: "right wing forces exploited workers who had not the consciousness of others". She went on to insult Chilean copper miners as "the aristocracy of the workers".

As labour unrest became more serious, Allende lost his grip over the workers. Workers seized up to 500 factories and began stockpiling arms. Communes or soviets were formed in working class neighbourhoods. Just before the coup there were massive daily demonstrations by workers.

Chilean capitalist saw that workers were going to fend for themselves forgetting Allende. Allende had failed in his task of appeasing proletarian unrest. The same capitalists who put him into power gave the nod to the generals to depose him, in favour of more ruthless methods of quelling working class militancy.

It is axiomatic to Marxists that the army is an arm of the state, and the state is an instrument of class rule. The capitalist class of Chile (in connivance with their class brothers, the US imperialists) controlled the army like a dog on a leash.

But the Chilean revisionists claimed otherwise. They claimed the army was "professional" and "democratic". A spokesman for the Canadian "Communist" Party returned from Chile with glowing words for Allende's constitutional road to socialism, and pointed out that the generals had "agreed to respect the constitution and the electoral decision of the people..." By promising such nonsense the revisionists helped bring on the catastrophe. They're like a leper without a bell, spreading illusions in the workers' movement.

The coup proved that revisionism kills, and it can often be seen later peddling the bones. The "Communist" Party of Canada, under William Kashbox, has leaped in to claim a monopoly on "defend Chile" events, and is clamoring to the side of its Russian and Chilean cronies to explain away the corpses. They offer tours for Mrs. Allende to mourn the dead and console the living.

For those, such as the Trotskyites, who still have a soft spot in their heads for Fidel Castro, it might be of interest to point out that the Cubans were so concerned about the death of Allende that they announced on the front page of their Party paper that they were proclaiming three days of national mourning. Unfortunately this gesture of solidarity was tempered somewhat by the fact that on the same front page they announced three days of national mourning also for King Gustav of Sweden.

The revisionists, those who in the guise of Marxism and socialism, preach illusions about the ruling class and its methods are every bit as dangerous as the capitalists themselves. There is a big task before us all to see that everything possible is done to pressure and expose the fascist generals of Chile. But when it comes to the fakers who try to undermine the fight with sweet talk about easy "peaceful" roads to workers' power no time should be wasted in getting rid of them.

Alliance with bosses killed Chile: CPL

When Salvador Allende came to power in Chile, the revisionist "communist" party of Chile, along with its allies Brezhnev and Castro, raved about how socialism would be achieved by peaceful means. The ruling class would be voted out of power and the military would remain neutral.

Now Allende is dead as are thousands of workers and peasants. The new military junta is trying to exterminate the revolutionary left while people all over the world question how this situation arose.

The workers of Chile have taken a terrible blow. Volumes have already been written about the CIA support of the junta, about the death of "democracy", about the "martyrdom" of Allende, and so on. Most of this is honest outrage at the terrible events that have befallen the Chilean masses. But some of it stems from those who want to divert attention from the fact that the workers of Chile were led into a bloody tragedy by parliamentary socialists (like Allende) who claimed they would constitutionally transform Chile into a socialist country and by the phoney "Communist" Party of Chile who helped spread the poisonous lie that the ruling capitalist class would permit the workers to peacefully take power.

Since 1900 the Chilean working class has been organizing and rebelling against capitalism. Nitrate and railroad workers took the lead in the '20s and '30s by initiating

Chilean junta pleases Canada

By BOB BEAL
CANADIAN UNIVERSITY PRESS

Citing a necessity to protect Canadians and Canadian interests in Chile, External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp announced that the Canadian government had recognized the Chilean military junta. "Diplomatic recognition does not imply approval; we recognize many governments we don't agree with," he said.

Sharp's statements imply that Canadians and Canadian institutions have little to do with the political situation in Chile; that the military coup and subsequent brutality are simply an internal Chilean problem.

But history proves Sharp wrong.

Coups aren't accidents—they are made to happen. The recent coup in Chile began when, in 1970, the huge American multinational, International Telephone and Telegraph (ITT), waged an expensive and unsuccessful campaign to prevent the election of Salvador Allende.

Chile's economy a precondition for American domination

Like many other third world countries, Chile is hampered by an economy based almost entirely on a single primary resource. Copper accounts for about 80 per cent of Chile's annual foreign commerce.

Without the resources to successfully develop her copper reserves, the largest known in the world, Chile became a prime target of those with the necessary money and technology. And since the First World War, two large American corporations, Anaconda American Brass and Kennecott Copper, have propped immensely from their control of 80 to 90 per cent of Chile's total copper production.

In 1969, Kennecott had only 13 per cent of its world-wide investments in Chile but netted 21 per cent of its profits there. In the same year Anaconda had only 17 per cent of its investments in Chile while it collected 80 per cent of its profits there.

Chile's dependence on these two large American copper companies has meant that the Chilean people have benefited little from their country's wealth. Between 1911 and 1971, foreign investment in Chile totalled about $1 billion but, during that time, the foreign-owned companies removed about $7.2 billion from Chile, with Kennecott and Anaconda taking about $4.6 billion of this.

Aware of the vast wealth leaving the country, Chilean governments have occasionally attempted to increase their share. In 1952, a nationalist government took over foreign copper sales and increased taxes on copper but the companies decreased their copper production and the government backed down.

Before Allende, President Eduardo Frei made the most significant attempt to make copper profitable to Chile. In 1964 Frei's government agreed, at Kennecott's urging, to purchase 51 per cent of Kennecott's and Anaconda's Chilean mines provided the companies would expand the mines and increase production substantially. Chile then had a majority interest in its copper industry but, either by covert design or colossal error, Frei's ownership scheme failed miserably.

Frei's government paid more for 51 per cent of Kennecott's largest Chilean mine than the entire Kennecott operation in Chile was worth. Other companies must have envied Kennecott's deal, made by re-evaluating the shares to fraudulently inflate the book value of the mines. Anaconda did the same thing.

The copper companies also retained all corporate decision-making and book-keeping powers. The Chilean government had to rely on Anaconda's and Kennecott's "good faith" to benefit from the ownership of the mines and then, as before, the corporations showed they had little good faith when possibilities of huge profits existed.

Owning only 49 per cent of the mines, the American companies made higher profits and paid less taxes than when they owned 100 per cent. Between 1950 and 1965, the total value of exported copper was $3.2 billion. Of this, the companies withdrew (as profits and dividends) about $1.3 billion from Chile. Between 1966 and 1970 total export value was about the same as in the previous 15 years $3.2 billion, but, unreturned capital was about $1.4 billion and taxes were $654 million.

Anaconda and Kennecott did not spend any of their own money on the improvement and expansion of the mines. They negotiated American bank loans and the Chilean government, having little foreign currency or other assets if payment became necessary, guaranteed the loans. "The Chilean state (appeared) in the loan contracts as collateral," the Chile Copper Corporation (the company formed by the Allende government to control the mines) later sarcastically remarked.

Chile forced to buy American

Because Chile produces few manufactured goods, it must rely on foreign suppliers, mostly US-based, for most of its consumer and industrial goods. Since Chilean currency is not acceptable on world markets and, like most other third world countries, it has not been able to build substantial reserves of foreign currency, Chile is obliged to negotiate loans and credits with public and private lending institutions in other countries.

Usually Chile (or any other foreign customer) would make an agreement of sale with a company in another country for a multi-lateral institution (such as the World Bank) and ask that either Chile be granted a loan or that the seller be guaranteed payment (by extending an outstanding credit to Chile's account). The private companies which sell in foreign countries are thus protected by their own country's financial institutions from default of payment.

Having the most readily available credit and the most reliable money supply, the United States uses the system of loans and credits to further the international development of its corporations and to tie third-world countries to American goods.

American foreign aid, in the form of loans, grants, and credits, works in part to keep countries open to American corporate investment and American goods by burdening countries with US debts. A country can't open new lines of credit and change the kind of imported goods without having the capital to pay off the existing debts and finance a massive changeover.

Since the Second World War, the US has provided Chile with 40 per cent of its imports, including 65 per cent of its capital imports. In 1970, 78 per cent of Chile's short term credits came from the US.

President Frei survived his disastrous ownership scheme by plunging the country into the largest foreign debt in the third world—more than $3 billion by 1970—mostly in US loans and credits.

Kennecott goes to war

When Allende's government came to power in the fall of 1970, Chile was faced with a huge foreign debt while at the same time American corporations were reaping enormous profits.

Faced with such an economic situation, Allende's government took the logical step. In June 1971, the Chilean Congress unanimously passed a bill nationalizing the copper mines. Allende himself was concerned that only a small part of the copper companies' profits could greatly improve Chileans' lives.

The Chilean government compensated the companies for the loss of their investments but they deducted what they considered "excess profits" made by the companies since 1955. A reasonable (and generous) rate of profit, they decided, was 12 per cent. They also deducted, from the compensation due, the amount of value-inflating caused by Frei's ownership scheme and, since the corporations left the mines in poor repair, and had sabotaged some of the, they deducted the cost of necessary repairs.

Nationalization prevented the large copper companies from taking future profits, so Kennecott and Anaconda began a campaign designed to prevent Chilean copper from reaching market and to critically impair Chile's finest foreign credit.

Kennecott sent a strongly-worded letter to its customers advising them that the company was prepared to contest, in foreign courts, its rights to the Chilean copper. As well as intimidating foreign copper buyers, Kennecott and Anaconda embargoed repair parts, warehouse and medical supplies purchased by the Chilean government in the US and destined for the mines.

In the fall and winter of 1972-73, Kennecott was partially successful in gaining injunctions in European courts against the delivery of Chilean copper. This not only endangered Chile's copper markets and foreign credit rating, but the legal battles cost the Allende government money it didn't have.

In effect, Kennecott was using its vast corporate wealth to try to destroy the Allende government. As Time magazine reported: "Kennecott officials are determined to keep the heat on Chile. The Manhattan offices of general counsel Pierce McCreary, who is directing the campaign, has the air of a war room. His desk is strewn with shipping reports, and on one wall hangs a large map for plotting ships' courses."

ITT—covert but vicious persuasion

The Chilean Telephone Company, which controls most communications within Chile, was one of the International Telephone and Telegraph (ITT) Corporation's largest foreign earners, making over $10 million annually. Allende's government nationalized Chilean Telephone and began negotiations with ITT to determine compensation.

Unlike Kennecott, ITT does not participate in ownership of subsidiaries with many other companies; its directors are not also directors of many other companies; and it generally keeps much more to itself, out of public scrutiny. Even before Chilean Telephone was nationalized, ITT was at war with Allende's party. But it carried on this war in a much more covert and military manner than Kennecott.

Documents made public by Washington Post columnist Jack Anderson show that ITT had a number of plans to prevent Allende's ratification by the Chilean Congress after he was elected, and, when these failed, ITT drew up a plan to overthrow the government within six months. The corporation actively sought American government and Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) assistance.

In September 1972, ITT president Peter Peterson, a National Economic Policy Act (NEPA) member, Alexander Haig, then Henry Kissinger's assistant for national security, and other nationalizations in Chile.

Shortly after the meeting, William Merriam wrote to Peterson: "The 'economic squeeze' on Chilean international credit, and a lack of copper and on vital exports to finance the armed forces to 'order'." He also proposed CIA director John McCone is one of those in charge of Chile conspiracy.

Before Allende's congressional campaign, ITT had much the same plans. In two top ITT executives corresponded:

"Chances of thwarting Allende's power now are pegged on the collapse... Undercover efforts to bring about the bankruptcy of major savings and loan associations expected to trigger a run on the closure of some factories, real estate, etc."

"The pressures resulting from could force a major segment of the Democratic party (the opposition Congress) to reconsider their support of Allende... it would become a matter of business community in Allende and that the over-all health of the country is at stake. More important, mass unrest might produce a military to move."

In October 1972, Merriam wrote: "Approaches continue to be made to members of the Armed Forces to have them lead some sort of successful coup to date."

Chile couldn't say "charge"

American private banks could not nationalize companies' economic of Chile by granting Chile only term credits in 1972. Previous average of $220 million credit was not renewed, Chile's standing amount.

Two American banks, the Bank of America, had virtually within Chile. Many directors also directors of the large companies.

Although Chile was heavily foreign credit and had a large Allende's government nationalized because great amounts of Chile for the U.S. But Allende apparently did not foresee a credit boycott.

The Export-Import Bank of America government financial previously supplied about $100 million economic aid to Chile. But requests for loans and credits.

Eximbank guarantees private companies against default of payment customer, and also has some bank credits to foreign companies guarantees these credits.

A financial blockade would Chile to maintain economic resulting shortage of dollars members of the Chilean military used to buying the imports with the dollars. An effective would be invisible, but it would government look irresponsible to serve its people's needs.

Chile was very dependent on import needed goods. Without off, Chile had to dip into reserves of American dollars substantial reserves further "worthiness" and made it credits and loans.

Although American international domestic goods were cut off aid to Chile increased after 1971, the US granted Chile purchase of military aircraft at time as Eximbank refused of commercial aircraft. From 1972 until early this year, Allende Chile totalled $14.5 million. threw Allende was the aid—Allende and the Chile and political problems have merican design and origin. But rnement and Canadian cor- innocent as they would have

The Canadian government's Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce magazine, "Canada Commerce", in July 1973 said: "Trade opportunities in Chile are limited by shortages of foreign exchange and private bank credit lines."

Although Canadian exports to Chile, which depend on non-Chilean currency or bank credits, had been rising steadily throughout the sixties, they fell sharply after Allende's election, from $23 million in 1969 to $10 million in 1972. Canadian imports, though, rose significantly from $3.3 million in 1969 to $9.3 million in 1971 and $6.5 million in 1972.

Canada is not usually an importer of copper (we have and use our own) but has occasionally imported Chilean copper "if the market conditions are right", Trade and Commerce people say. In 1969, $18,000 worth of Chilean copper was imported to Canada and in 1970, $25,000.

But the year the Chilean government gave the copper mines to the people, 1971, was a very good year for Chilean copper in Canada. That year, more than $6 million worth of Chilean copper was imported to Canada. Trade and Commerce people say this disproportionate figure was the result of a single purchase of more than $5 million which, they speculate, was made by Noranda Mines, a Canadian copper mining and refining company.

One of the smaller companies Allende's government nationalized was Chile Canadian mines, a copper mining company controlled by Noranda Mines. Noranda recovered, from the Chilean government $4.1 million of its original $4.5 million investment in Chile Canadian Mines.

As Trade and Commerce officials suggest, it seems probable Noranda also got away with $5 million worth of copper and got it to Canada before the nationalization deadline to be marketed from Canada.

A. H. Zimmerman, a vice-president and controller of Noranda Mines, is on the boards of a number of Noranda subsidiaries and some other Canadian companies. Zimmerman is also a director of the Canadian government-owned Export Development Corporation.

Exporting development

In October 1972, when questioned about Canada's refusal of credits to Chile, Department of External Affairs officials referred reporters to the crown-owned Export Development Corporation (EDC). EDC's vice-president refused to comment for publication.

The EDC is the Canadian equivalent of the American Export-Import Bank; it provides loans and credits to foreign buyers of Canadian goods and services and insures financing granted by private banks to foreign customers. An EDC official said recently that the Corporation's policy towards Chile "of late has not been exactly 'hands-off', but we haven't provided any extended financing."

In March 1973, Conservative MP for Oxford, W. B. Nesbitt, complained that a company in his riding, Timber Jack, had negotiated a $4 million sale of logging equipment to Chile but the EDC turned down Chile's request for credit for the sale.

In the House of Commons, Nesbitt said: "(I) discussed the matter with officials of EDC, and was informed that they were acting in accordance with government policy not to extend loans to Chile at present. . . . I would be surprised if the government of the United States has not attempted to put some pressure on the government of this country, through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and asked us to restrict trade to Chile."

From 1961 to August 1970, the total financing agreements signed by Chile with the EDC amounted to $24.7 million. Since Allende's elections, there has been no EDC financing granted to Chile. Nesbitt's suspicion of American pressure is probably true. But there is more to it than that.

The EDC's board of directors includes civil servants and representatives of the "private sector". The Corporation's act was changed recently, reducing the number of civil servants on the board from eight to seven and increasing private sector representation from four to five.

Including Noranda's Zimmerman, there have been six private sector, EDC board members since 1969: P. H. Leman, P. R. Sandwell, I. S. Ross, R. D. Southern, and Arthur F. Mayne. While Allende was in power, these people (plus the civil servants on the board) had control of Canadian public credit and loans and, to some extent, control of private bank financing to foreign customers.

Five of these six were, during the time they were EDC directors, representatives of companies which had substantial investments in Chile. Two of these, Zimmerman and Mayne, represented companies whose Chilean investments had been nationalized and Mayne was one of the people who launched a vicious propaganda and legal campaign against the Chilean government. The other companies represented on the EDC board which had interest in Chile, though not nationalized, were always faced with the possibility of nationalization while Allende was president.

• P. H. Leman is president of Alcan Aluminum which has substantial interests throughout Latin America and the Caribbean but not in Chile.

• P. R. Sandwell is president of Sandwell and Company, an engineering firm which has at least one contract in Chile. He is also a director of Placer Development, in which Noranda has a controlling interest.

• When Sandwell resigned in October 1971, he was replaced on the EDC by I. S. Ross, president of Swan Wooster Engineering which is 40 per cent owned by Sandwell and Company and 60 per cent by Swan Wooster Holding.

• R. D. Southern is president of Atco Industries, a company which produces transportable buildings. He is also a director of Crown Zellerbach Canada, a subsidiary of Crown Zellerbach International, an American corporation which owns, jointly with another company, a mill in Chile to produce specialty papers.

• Last, and certainly best, is Arthur F. Mayne. Until his death in September 1972, EDC director Mayne was president of Kennecott Canada, a director of the parent company, Kennecott Copper Corporation, and a director of Kennecott's Chilean subsidiary, Braden Copper.

It is not surprising that the government-owned Export Development Corporation followed the lead of its American counterpart and curtailed financial assistance to Chile.

Until the recent coup, the Allende government was negotiating with Canada's largest shoe manufacturer, Thomas J. Bata, for the purchase of a 51 per cent interest in his $10 million plant in Chile. The Bata Shoe Company maintains factories throughout the third world where labour costs are low.

Other Canadian companies still in Chile are: Atlas Explorations, which owns 75 per cent of a mine; BC Packers (owned by George Weston Company which also owns Loblaw's, Eddy Paper, Sayveter, and Nabob) which owns 33 per cent of a fish packing plant; Chemetics Ltd. (50 per cent owned by Canadian Industries Ltd.) which has at least a $1.5 million interest in a sodium chlorate plant; Bayer Drugs (a Canadian subsidiary of the American company) which owns a pharmaceutical plant in Chile; and Sandwell and Company which has, jointly with John Inglis Co., a $14 million interest in a pulp and paper mill.

Although Canadian companies' investments in Chile are far less than those of their American counterparts, these companies have a vested interest in maintaining a "favourable" government in Chile. The recent coup guarantees that they will be able to continue to exploit Chile as a source of cheap labour and materials.

"After the cutting of the lines of credit from the World Bank and other international organizations of finance, some Canadian and Dutch banks have also decided to stop credits allotted to Chile because of the Kennecott affair," the October 12-18, 1972 issue of Le Monde said.

Some Canadian private banks had offered to provide loans and credits to Chile, but at very high rates of interest. The attitude of Canada's private banks was not just in response to American initiatives or the lack of EDC guarantees.

Of the 231 directors of the five major Canadian chartered banks, about one-quarter are also directors of subsidiaries of very large American corporations (or, in a few cases, of the parent companies themselves) whose interest in Chile were nationalized (or of Noranda Mines and its subsidiaries).

As well, there are probably a significant number of Canadian bank directors who are also directors of subsidiaries of smaller American companies whose interests were nationalized.

Who wins?

The recent coup in Chile benefited many American and Canadian corporations and their governments. Although these interest groups may not have had a direct hand in bankrolling the coup, they all helped to create an economic and political situation which made the coup probable.

ITT, as well as helping to instigate the coup probably also helped finance and organize it. Other corporations and the American government certainly had enough motive to provide technical and financial aid to the coup's leaders.

Neither Chilean socialism nor its father, Salvadore Allende, committed suicide. They were killed by the American government and corporate elite, actively assisted by other capitalist governments and corporations.

Sexism condemned (again)

By JILL MacKAY

Anger and resentment focused around the familiar theme of male oppression at a Saturday workshop on human sexuality during the Ontario Women's Conference.

In a wide-ranging and frequently confusing discussion attended by about 35 women, many expressed the feeling that their oppression was grounded in the age-old power struggle between the sexes.

Other workshop participants said men were afraid to recognize women as their sexual equals for fear of losing a measure of omnipotence won through subjugation.

Much of the discussion centred around a woman's competition for men's attention which participants indicated isolates women from each other.

Banners displayed in Cody Hall's School of Nursing corridors read, "Women Unite," the theme chosen by the conferences organizers—the Ontario Federation of Students and U of T's SAC—but the theme remained unresolved during this workshop.

The fact that women are refused a complete sexual identity is grounded in the whole capitalist structure, said Helen Ridley, worker for Health Collective in Toronto.

In the field of health, she said she believed the medical profession, predominately male, by withholding or distorting information denied women the right to make vital decisions concerning their bodies.

In cases concerning birth control, abortion and venereal disease, said Ridley, the doctor's ignorance or lack of support can have serious consequences for individuals too intimidated to seek further aid.

Following this, anger was directed by several persons at the business world whose interests are to keep women at the level of consumer or to market her as a sex object.

One point mentioned often was the shallowness of the role that women have to live up to and the subsequent difficulty in regarding her sexuality with any degree of pride.

Connie Swinton, a nurse in the family planning unit of U of T's School of Hygiene, related that many women felt either a distaste or lack of proper concern for their bodies. Others in the group reported a similar sense of shame and the necessity of overcoming it.

In attempting to understand and accept themselves women may turn to other women for sexual support. Rowena Hunniset from the Lesbian Collective, a division of the Women's Place in Toronto, felt that women were limiting their self awareness through purely heterosexual contact which establishes the female as merely a receptacle for the male.

The film shown, Sexuality and Communication, was based on the work of Masters and Johnston and done by a similar husband and wife counselling team from London, Ont.

Through skilful improvisations filmed live at the Ontario Science Centre, they showed how mutual ignorance and fear of communication rather than any physical incompetence created most breakdowns in sexual relations.

The ignorant physician, the performance-conscious husband the nervous, repressed wife were the mutually-reinforcing components in a triangle of bitterness and despair in the movie.

The discussion was fairly disjointed and never addressed itself for long to any one issue. However it was lively and often engaging if only for the colorful nature of the subject matter. Women were fighting about whether or not it was enjoyable to have a baby, and there was intense argument on how one would go about raping a man.

No conclusions were arrived at or resolutions brought to the plenary session which followed.

Lengthy Armstrong trial over

By BOB BETTSON

After one of the lengthiest extradition hearings in recent history, Karlton Armstrong was shipped off to Madison, Wisconsin, from Toronto last April to face murder and arson charges in connection with the August, 1970, bombing of the Army Math Research Centre in Madison.

That trial is now virtually completed after Armstrong pleaded guilty to a second-degree murder charge.

At a Saturday session in Toronto designed to counteract the virtual news-blackout surrounding the trial, Gabriel Kolko, a York University history professor, described Armstrong's trial as "the first political trial of all the war-related charges."

Because of Armstrong's guilty plea, Kolko explained, the court waived normal rules of evidence and allowed the political circumstances of the bombing to be aired in the courtroom.

Kolko called the trial an "important success." It "focused the attention of the public on the Vietnam war." He explained that most of the witnesses were testifying about their personal experiences in the anti-war movement.

Armstrong's statement to the trial was read in which he said, "I am pleading guilty to these charges so that I will fully be able to fully deal with the real issues and not be inhibited by the restrictions of a trial.

"I in no way regard these acts as crimes and that by entering a plea of guilty I am merely recognizing the bare facts. The acts which I have been credited were undertaken with the purpose of crippling the efforts of the American government to wage an illegal and criminal and aggressive war against the Indo-chinese peoples, to prevent the further loss of life devastation and suffering.

"I have acted out of a feeling of moral responsibility and felt that for me not to have taken action against this war would have been criminally irresponsible."

Armstrong was discovered in Toronto in February, 1972, and finally extradited after 13 months in the Don Jail to stand trial in the United States. His lawyers unsuccessfully tried to prevent the extradition on the grounds that the bombing was a "political" crime and therefore exempted from extradition treaties between Canada and the United States.

For much of the time in Toronto he was held in isolation, and during the extradition hearing evidence was allowed that was from witnesses who were not present and could not be cross-examined.

However the Canadian authorities and County Court Judge Harvey Weisberg refused to consider the bombing a political act and all appeals were denied.

Witnesses brought to Toronto included many of the leaders of the anti-war movement in the US, including Noam Chomsky, Tom Hayden, Staughton Lynd and SDSers Mark Levy, James O'Brien and Phillip Ball.

The charges Armstrong was extradited for involved four counts arson and first degree murder in the bombing. A researcher was killed and three people injured when the bomb exploded early in the morning, Aug. 24, 1970.

The bombing came after three-years widespread protests had failed to get the Army research centre removed from the university campus in 1970. The centre was exposed by students for its direct involvement in weapons research for use in the Vietnam and Cambodian war efforts.

Armstrong was the only suspect found of the four that were sought. His brother is still in the FBI's most wanted list with a reward of $100,000 for information leading to his capture, unprecedented in US history.

Armstrong himself has been in prison for almost two years now since his capture. His bail of $450,000 was the largest in Wisconsin state history. He pleaded guilty to second degree murder and four counts of arson, and, according to Kolko, will face a sentence of possibly 25 years.

The meeting also hear accounts of Armstrong's physical deterioration after months in virtual solitude. He has been held in a holding jail in Madison which with its turn over in population has deprived him of any friendship with other prisoners.

Kolko explained that his role had been to discuss the role of the university in American military research and the historical role of war resistance. Kolko is an American expatriate and a major figure in the anti-war movement in Toronto.

Sentencing will be this Thursday after the final summations. Kolko said that the hearing was more significant than the Boston trial of Benjamin Spock for counseling people to evade the draft.

He said that Friday's final statements of both Karl and his parents were "very powerful". Armstrong's mother testified that the bombing never would have taken place if parents had supported the students in their attempts to close down the research centre.

Armstrong spoke for three and a half hours despite the fact that he has not been outside since returning to Madison last April.

Lisa Zavarella reports on Judo...

For the first time in the U of T's athletic history we were represented by a women's judo team: Fern Brand (yellow belt), Ann Jamnik (white) and Lisa Zavarella (white). They came away from the annual invitational tournament at Cornell University with one second place trophy.

The competition from the Cornell Judo Club was stacked with "Big Mama" green belts. The overnight bus ride left the varsity women in less than fresh condition. Brand managed to overcome these obstacles to win second place in the lightweight category.

Jamnik and Zavarella were winning in the first couple of matches but they lacked the stamina that comes from prolonged practice and lost to more experienced competitors.

A largely rookie men's (most of the higher-ranked judokas graduated last year) showed potential as the majority of its members advanced to at least the quarter finals.

Dave Passmore won the 154 pounds and under in the brown belt division; Norm Sakamoto placed third in same division, 130 pounds and under.

Wing Nip reports on men's fencing

... The men's fencing club held its annual Hennyey Trophy tournament last week. Newcomer Abul Nazir captured first place in foil, with Peter Hlavats second and Erray Ali third.

In epee, second year man Dave Harmer took first followed by John Roth and Abul Nazir. Veteran Andy Benyei retained his sabre title while rookies Tom Ladanyi and Mike Barthmann were second and third respectively.

The club this year is missing the services of veterans Eli Sukunda, Lorenzo Liscio (sabre) and Johannes Kaczynski (foil) through graduation but the second and third year fencers are showing a lot of promise.

Yoko Ode on women's fencing... A mistaken belief that three woman teams would be the order of the day forced Toronto to borrow two fencers from other schools for the Queen's invitational tournament this weekend.

They recovered quickly to sweep the tournament without a loss. Ann Stokes, who was personally undefeated for the entire tournament, captain Maureen Evans, Penny Blake and Yoko Ode made up the first place Toronto 'A' team.

McMaster was second, Queen's 'A' third and Toronto 'B' fourth in an eight school field. The Toronto 'B' team consisted of Jane Scotchmer, Liz Lozinko, and the two borrowed players.

Brad Morley reports on cross country... Two Varsity teams competed in Buffalo at the 21st annual Canisius College invitational cross country race. In the four and one-half mile junior varsity race for freshmen, U of T's Mike Dyon won a tough race in a time of 22:09.9.

John Hiley ran in a respectable time of 22:48 to finish eighth. Filling out the team were Greg Lockhart (15), Paul Barry (19), John Ferguson

In the varsity race John Sharp came up with one of his best races ever to finish second only half a second behind Paul Stemmer of Allegheny, who ran a time of 21:05:06. Both runners broke the course record. Brad Morley (18), Joe Campisi (79) and Rick Cunningham (105) rounded out the senior team.

Western hosts the OUA Cross Country Championships this coming Saturday. Toronto is the defending titlist and figures to be the favorite for a repeat on the basis of several fine exhibition results. The host team, who held the Little Cup from 1970-72, should give them stiff competition.

Blues beat Stangs, miss title shot with tie

By PETER HILLIER

On a very windy Thursday afternoon the soccer Blues destroyed all play-off hopes for the Western Mustangs and kept their own hopes kindling with a 4-2 win in London.

Giuseppe D'Antoni, the Blues leftwinger, inspired the Toronto offence as he figured in all four goals. Early in the game Marco Antonio released a long pass through centre field that D'Antoni controlled on the run, out-sprinting the Western defence, and then shot low into the right corner of the net.

With ten minutes remaining in the first half this same winger was racing for a loose ball against his right defender and the goaltender in the Mustang penalty area. The former pushed D'Antoni into a picturesque somersault, resulting in a penalty that Tim Burns converted.

Midway through the second half D'Antoni was attempting to head a ball in the home team's penalty area when a lanky defender tried to kick the ball. Dangerous kicking resulted in another penalty which Burns again converted.

Geoff Creve can be faulted in an otherwise flawless game when he shot a clearance right into the on-rushing Mustang offender Roman Schneider, allowing the same a scoring breakaway on the helpless goalie Judd. D'Antoni scored his second goal ten minutes later after he persisted in stealing the ball from a Mustang defender. His shot hit a Western defender and flew high over the retreating goalie.

Western were awarded a penalty late in the game when the referee considered that a collision between the ball and Burns' arm (on a corner kick) affected the Blues control of the play. Schneider converted the penalty to round out the scoring.

Faced with the necessity of winning in order to keep their play-off hopes alive the Blues stumbled to a disappointing 1-1 draw at McMaster on Saturday in their last game of the league season.

The goal that cost them the game was the result of the last of a series of grotesque defensive errors which have plagued the Blues throughout the season. Exclusive of penalties and these almost comical Toronto mishaps, opponents have scored no more than one goal of their own contriving.

On this occasion, leading 1-0 with fifteen minutes to go, a hopeful and innocuous high lob down the middle caused the damage. Ignoring Judd's call to leave it Burns sought instead to nod the ball back towards him.

Judd found himself stranded out of goal by Burns' intervention and the McMaster centre forward was left with the easy task of converting the goal.

After an undistinguished first half in which Toronto played too many long balls instead of exploiting their superior football skills with more constructive short passing, the Blues had gone ahead ten minutes into the second through neat combination between three forwards. Picking up a loose ball outside the McMaster penalty area Hillier stabbed a pass through to D'Antoni outflanking the home defence on the left wind. His neat flick into the middle was met and vollied in by Ferullo running past a static back line from the right.

After this the Blues played good soccer till the end of the game but were unable to add to their tally. Working the ball out of defence and dominating the mid-field the Blues played almost entirely in the McMaster half. Moves tended to break down on the edge of the opponents' penalty area, and when they did not, chances were missed through over hastiness or lack of thought.

In this respect, as in the case of the unfocused defensive error, the game was representative of the season as a whole. Despite evident superiority to all the teams they have met this season, Toronto has been unable or unwilling to make the game as easy as it should be, given a clear edge in ability. Missing too often from their play were the determination and aggression displayed by their less gifted opponents.

Dopeless music backed

WASHINGTON (LNS-CUP) — The US Supreme Court rejected on October 15 a challenge to the Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) controversial ruling that discourages the broadcasting of "drug-oriented" song lyrics.

The decision left standing lower-court rulings against a Yale University radio station which had contested the dictum as an affront to free speech.

The FCC directive threatens to hold broadcasters accountable at license renewal time for failing to evaluate and self-censor songs glorifying the use of drugs.

The Court's action was taken over the strong objections of Justices William Brennan and William O. Douglas. Douglas termed the decision unconstitutional.

Writing for the minority, Douglas said, "for now the regulation is applied to song lyrics, next year it may apply to comedy programs, and the following year to news broadcasts."

Douglas' fears are justified by more than mere theoretical possibilities. Last year the FCC and Nixon media expert Clay Whitehead tried to get a bill through Congress which would hold local TV stations "responsible at license renewal time for the content of news programs."

Cor Doret sets season TD record

Ottawa and Lumsden kill Blues' title hopes

By PAUL CARSON

Cor Doret set a scoring record but that was all the Varsity football fans had to shout about Saturday at the Stadium as the intercollegiate football season ended for Toronto supporters when the Blues fell 24-7 to the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees.

The loss ended Blues faint playoff hopes and simultaneously clinched first place for the Gee-Gees and a place in the OUA football finals against either Laurier or Western. Blues finished their eight-game schedule with a 4-4 record while Ottawa is 6-1 with one game remaining. Queens dumped McMaster 34-14 and ended second place with a 4-3 season mark.

Doret, a likely repeater as Blues most valuable player, scored Varsity's only touchdown on a 50-yard run midway through the third quarter following Rick Nakatsu's interception of an Ottawa pass. The touchdown was Doret's thirteenth of the current season, one more than the former record he shared with Queen's halfbacks Gord McLellan and Brian Warrender.

Playing his final college game, Doret ran nine times for a net total of 74 yards but his solid effort wasn't enough to inspire an offensive unit that gained only 207 yards in a game Blues simply had to win. By comparison, Blues gained more than 207 yards in just the second quarter of last week's victory over Queen, but that was last week. Saturday, Blues just couldn't come up with the big offensive play when they needed it.

Varsity had a chance to break the game open early when flanker Henry Tobias circled out of the backfield and raced uncovered down the sideline in front of the team benches. He was about 20 yards in the clear but Dunkley's pass floated in the swirling wind and Tobias fell out of bounds after making a spectacular catch of what should have been a touchdown pass instead of only a long gain.

Gee-Gees defence then held on the next series and an excellent scoring opportunity came to naught.

As usual in Ottawa victories, their all-star halfback Neil Lumsden played the main role. He opened the scoring with a 37-yard field goal in the second quarter and later added two touchdowns and three converts to extend his own single season scoring record to 38 points.

As a runner, Lumsden carried 25 times for 128 yards and also caught two passes for 12 more as Ottawa piled up 412 yards (188 running, 234 passing) to almost double Blues' net total of 207 (62 running, 145 passing).

For the umpteenth successive season, Varsity's playoff hopes were killed by a breakdown in the kicking game. This time it was a blocked kick as Ottawa lineman Mike O'Connor broke through to cleanly block a Don Thomson punt in the second quarter and the Gee-Gees took over on the Varsity 12-yard line.

Four plays later Lumsden scored from the two and Ottawa went into the dressing room with a 10-0 lead.

Blues couldn't move the ball as the third quarter opened and some solid Lumsden running set up his second touchdown which made it 17-0 at the five-minute mark. Then came Nakatsu's interception and Doret's record run which turned a rout into a game again at 8:42 of the third quarter.

Blues defensive unit stopped the Gee-Gees cold for a few series but a succession of inept calls by the game officials halted a number of Varsity drives and eventually Blues' frustration at the incompetent and insistent officiating began to affect their own timing and play selection.

Numerous pass interference infractions, particularly involving Blues' receivers Brent Elsey, Henry Tobias and Esteban Andryjowicz, were not penalized while deep umpire Russ Wilson nailed Varsity defender Rick Jeysman late in the fourth quarter for an interference penalty that still hasn't happened. The official was behind the play and didn't see Ottawa receiver Jeff Avery push Jeysman before doing a neat swandive to collect the penalty.

Ottawa did lose two touchdowns to clipping penalties on long run-backs but these calls were blatantly obvious, though in one instance the official missed the real clip and twenty yards downfield he then penalized Gee-Gees for a very legal block, perhaps in a subconscious effort to make amends for his earlier mistake.

Ironically, one of the official's few correct calls in the second half led to the clinching touchdown as Ottawa split-end Doug Falconer and Varsity defender Greg Pyley simultaneously caught a pass from Gee-Gees quarterback Jim Colton.

The referee correctly ruled the play as a completion for Falconer and a few runs later, halfback Pete Quigley scored behind a block from guess who? Lumsden.

It was a sad final game for quarterback Wayne Dunkley who evaded a strong Ottawa rush for most of the day to complete 13 of 24 passes including three to Tobias and four to a good-looking rookie end, Chris Kotsopoulos.

Defensive captain Hartley Stern also ended his college football career with another solid hard-hitting game and offensive guard Bruce Parrack did his usual competent job in the obscurity of the trenches.

With only these four players expected to be missing next year, 1974 could be a successful season. The talent and coaching will be there, but they've been there every year since the last Varsity championship in 1967. If only consistency could be developed with the ease of a Dunkley or Stern or Lumsden.

Rugby Blues keep play-off chances alive

By JAMES MacDONALD

On Saturday the first XV redeemed itself against Queen's as it rumbl-ed to a 17-3 win. The game was largely won in the forwards' play in contrast to two weeks ago when the Blues' pack was ineffective for much of the game.

The first minutes set the tone for the afternoon as both teams came in hitting hard with determination and vigour. The Blues' pack drove through and showed their improved maul and ruck techniques as play was mostly confined to the Gaels' half of the field. Dave Amborski put the Blues ahead 3-0 as he kicked one of his typical penalty goals, just clearing the cross-bar by inches. Play battled back and forth until 20 minutes into the half when winger Brooks broke down the side-line for 30 yards to within two yards of the goal-line. The loose ball rolled into the end-zone and captain John Drummond ended up with the ball to give Toronto another four points, but the try was not converted and the Blues were ahead 7-0. The Gaels appeared to be undaunted as they soon took the offensive and put on a display of rugby as well as a great deal of hustle as they went over the Toronto goal-line. Fortunately for the Blues the try was called back for a knock-on. This turn of events appeared to demoralize the Queen's team as Toronto almost immediately swept down the field, with an incredible 50 yard run by Paul Kitchen to the Gaels five yard line. The Blues snatched the ball from the ensuing line-out but the initial run by the backs was defeated until Rodger Wright picked up the loose ball and crashed in for the score. Amborski's converted and Toronto led at the half 13-0.

In the second half Queen's picked up three points early on a 20 yard penalty goal. This was to be their only score all afternoon as the Toronto defensive play tightened up. The Blues soon developed a new attack as Drummond punted the ball a good 45 yards from a penalty kick to the corner flag on the Gaels' goal-line. A ruck formed from the line-out and a scrum was ordered by the referee as the ball did not come out. Although Queen's won the ball their clearing kick was blocked and a 5 yard scrum given to Toronto. The Blues won the ball and wing-forward Chris Hicks gathered up the ball and dove in for four. Amborski's convert failed, for a final score of 17-3.

Toronto is now in second place behind, York whom they play next Wednesday night in Varsity Stadium at 9:00. While Toronto still has a mathematical chance to win the eastern division it depends on the Gaels defeating York next Saturday at York.

The second XV was crushed 37-3 by a vastly superior Queen's team on Saturday. The game was mostly a repeat of two weeks ago as first half play was even, but right from the opening whistle of the second half the Gaels started their drive to 30 unanswered points.

The Toronto team opened up the scoring more than half way into the first period as Bruce Carroll connected on a 25 yard penalty kick from the sideline. However Queen's bounced back to get three points of their own on a 15 yard penalty goal. Play once more continued in its see-saw fashion until just minutes before the half when the Gaels picked up an unconverted try from an unfortunate mistake by the Blues in a scrum close to their goal-line.

The Gaels kicked off to Toronto to start the second half and they gained another four points after a wild pass on the Blues' goal-line following the deep kick. It was down hill the rest of the way as they picked up two more unconverted and three converted tries. Their three-quarters line constantly had an over-lap as they demonstrated better play than the Queen's first team backs had been able to muster.

The second fifteen is really out of the running now for the division championship although a tie or win next Wednesday against the Yeomen will give them second place.

Blues had something to jump for as they beat Queen's 17-3.

S.Africa mission now, Chile may be next

THE Varsity
Vol. 94, No. 21
Wed. Oct. 31, 1973
TORONTO

By DICK BROWN
© THE VARSITY 1973

The Ontario government's trade mission wings its way to South Africa this evening, and senior officials in the department of industry and tourism are planning another mission next spring which by their own admission, may include Chile.

The eight-man delegation leaving Toronto International Airport on an 8 pm BOAC flight to London, England, caused another round of charges and counter-charges in the legislature yesterday. Claude Bennett, minister of industry and tourism, defended the mission and refuted opposition claims that the seven companies involved would deal in strategic arms.

However, while senior ministry officials describe with care the precautions they have taken to ensure that no military usage will be put to Ontario's goods, they admit that once delivered, they have no control over where the products go.

While the debate raged in the house over the South Africa trade mission and black groups protested outside Queen's Park, more than a dozen firms have been in contact with the ministry about its spring (1974) trade mission to South America.

One official who is helping to make the plans for the South American mission was asked if Chile would be on the travel list. He replied with an instant, "YES!" and then abruptly qualified it by saying final plans have not yet been drawn up.

The spring trade mission is currently scheduled for what ministry officials call the "Andean Group" of countries which include: Venezuela, Columbia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia and Chile.

Venezuela and Columbia appear high on the list and there would probably be no more than four such countries on the selling trip because it would only last two weeks.

Chile is not automatically ruled out by senior provincial officials, and with the diplomatic recognition of the ruling junta by the Canadian federal government, there is no prohibition on trade, the provincial officials say.

One point about Chile which could scratch it off the spring list would be massive economic aid to the new regime by the US government.

Senior officials say that in any developing country in which either the US or Japanese governments have a heavy economic commitment, Canada usually gets squeezed out on trade missions — although they admit that Canada can get some of the left-over contracts the two larger powers did not pick up.

Ministry officials are watching Chile closely now, particularly any attempts by the new regime at economic rapprochement with the US.

Officials indicate that such a mission to Chile might depend slightly on the political climate in Canada, but mainly on the "need to assist" the country and the tariff structures of international trade between Chile and Canada.

The trade mission to South Africa will last about two weeks and the delegation will use the facilities of the federal government's two permanent trade missions located in Johannesburg and Cape Town.

The time-table of the mission is tight, with the group arriving in South Africa on Friday in Johannesburg and moving on to Cape Town on November 9.

While the government is footing the return air fare for the seven executives — at a cost of more than $12,000, — no firm return flight arrangements have been made by the government for the trade party.

Each member is free to return by whatever route he wishes, and ministry officials say there is nothing to prevent individuals from stopping at whichever countries they like on the way back.

Replying to questions in the house raised yesterday by NDP leader Stephen Lewis, Industry Minister Bennett read off a list of the items each of three firms charged with dealing in military products in the past are hoping to sell.

Perfection Automotive (Windsor) Ltd. is intending to sell heavy-duty rear-view mirrors for cars and trucks towing house trailers, Bennett said.

The firm is also selling heavy-duty suspension components, hand-held spot lamps, underhood truck lamps, speedometer cable, commercial vehicle running lights, exhaust system components, and hand-operated carburetor-choke conversion kits, Bennett added.

After the session in the house, however, senior officials said that the only guarantee they had that any of these items would be for non-military use is the list of restricted goods put out by the federal government (the items fall within the approved list) and the address and purchaser of the goods.

The Ontario government does not attempt to follow up what happens to the goods after they are delivered.

Ed Clarke, chairman of the National Black Coalition, said yesterday that South Africa has no need to import guns or direct military goods from Canada.

He pointed to the $10.1 million in Canadian exports to South Africa last year for commercial and non-commercial trucks and parts.

"These could all be converted to troop carriers," Clarke said. "The conversion would take place in South Africa after the goods are delivered and the (Ontario) government wouldn't know about it."

McPhar Geophysics Ltd. of Toronto, a company which in the past has participated in unclassified contracts under the Canada-US defence production sharing agreements, will be taking geophysical survey equipment to South Africa, Bennett said in the house.

In addition to highly sophisticated mapping equipment, McPhar is also supplying what senior provincial officials term "complete supply services" to do aerial mapping for mineral deposits, including the plane and pilot, if necessary.

McPhar Geophysics is 73.4 per cent owned by the British firm, Imperial Chemical Industries (ICI) through the Canadian subsidiary of Canadian Industries Ltd. (CIL).

ICI has a 42.5 per cent holding in AE & CI, the second largest industrial company in South Africa, a company which also does munitions production.

Ward Leonard of Canada Ltd., listed in the Canadian Defence Commodity Producers catalogue published by the federal government, will be bidding on an automated solid state theatre and TV studio lighting control system for the South African TV authority, Bennett told the house.

The firm, 98.8 per cent owned by US interests, will also be selling wire-bound resistors in an attempt to muscle a Japanese competitor out of the South African market, Bennett indicated.

Pressed on the point, one senior official admitted there was no control past the sale, and admitted the ministry is aware of middlemen who, as independent operators in a foreign country, buy goods ostensibly for peaceful purposes but then resell them as strategic commodities.

He indicated that the Ontario government does not sell to such middlemen when they are identified but admitted there is not total control.

Ministry officials say the protest to the South African trade mission has not slowed them down, but security has tightened.

Following threatening phone calls to the ministry last week, the ministry "took measures" to screen calls. Other reports indicate that at least 70 out-of-town RCMP constables have been brought in to assure a safe bon voyage of the trade mission's plane tonight, although at press time there were no reports of any planned demonstrations at the airport.

At Queen's Park, however, there were two peaceful protests over the last week about the trade mission. Both demonstrations drew about 40 persons to the front lawn and both were sponsored by various black groups in the city.

South Africa receives about 70 per cent of its imports from five countries: Britain 21 per cent, the US 17 per cent, Japan 16 per cent, West Germany 15 per cent, and Canada one per cent.

TTC defers vote on student fares

For students, it's a motherhood issue: every student is in favor of lower TTC fares.

But for the Metro Transportation committee on Monday, it wasn't motherhood at all. It was a question of the dollars and cents. Poor Mum.

The committee voted to defer for a month a proposal that all full-time post-secondary students get the same reduced fare as high school students, seven tickets for $1 compared to the regular adult fare of four tickets for $1.

A majority of the committee members agreed with Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey who urged that the whole matter be set aside so the TTC could make a study of how many students would qualify for the reduced rate and what costs Metro would incur by underwriting the scheme.

U of T has more than 20,000 full-time students. Alderman William Kilbourn of Toronto estimated the total number of post-secondary students in Metro would be about 70,000.

Metro's 300,000 high school students have long had the reduced fare, and this year it was extended to a 24-hour basis.

Reducing motherhood to its most clear-cut terms, Kilbourn said: "It's a matter of simple justice. It's a question of extending the principle to all full-time students in order to make public transit more accessible to them."

Godfrey, who thinks more about the good things the Scarborough expressway will do than TTC fares, chimed in: "I'm sympathetic to the idea, but I'd like to know what the estimated cost will be to the taxpayers. I think the members of Metro council and the commission should have the figures available so they know what they're buying."

The argument over bucks finally prevailed after York Mayor Philip White went to bat for the homeowners who pay part of the load in municipal taxes.

"Where is it all going to stop?" he asked no one in particular. "How far can the home owner who's paying $25 to $30 a year now for the TTC go to continually paying subsidies? I have to worry about the mill rate."

The whole issue started earlier this fall when Toronto Aldermen Karl Jaffary and Reid Scott received letters from persons in their wards asking if anything could be done about getting reduced fares for college and university students.

One letter, from U of T student Brian Gallagher, told Scott he wouldn't drive if he had a car because "there is nowhere to park a car downtown anyway and I don't want to waste my time behind the wheel of a car when I could be sleeping on the subway. I am a willing customer of the TTC."

In a letter to the committee, Jaffary threw in his lot with the motherhood crew indicating that the one-fare system will result in a loss less than the TTC had originally anticipated because of an increase in passengers.

He used this economic argument to urge the committee to go ahead and approve the idea and send it on to the TTC for approval.

All campus pubs will be controlled by administration

By MARINA STRAUSS

New provincial legislation will give the university administration ultimate control over all campus pubs, including those now run by students. Bill 146, which came into effect earlier this month, allows universities and colleges to have permanently licenced establishments on their premises.

However, only the "chief administrator of the university" can make the application for a licence on the part of any group on campus, Liquor Licence Board of Ontario (LLBO) registrar Hugh Brown stipulated.

"Under the new legislation, we have a central authority responsible for any problems that might arise," Brown explained.

Student-run pubs now on campus are under special occasion permits issued on a temporary basis.

"Under this procedure we handled a problem by cancelling the licence and refusing to issue another," Brown said.

"The new legislation was meant to reach the same end by a different route," he noted. "It makes the administration officer responsible instead of the student."

The new law was passed a month after U of T administrators decided to give the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) a free hand in running their own pub.

SAC has already obtained a special occasion licence and will run its pub two nights weekly starting this Friday.

But the LLBO has been stalling since September in granting a permanent licence to the Students Administrative Government of Erindale (SAGE) for its pub, which now runs on a special occasion permit.

The LLBO refused to deal with SAGE representatives, insisting that the university administration must make the formal application.

U of T has not as yet applied for a permanent licence. But once the university has acquired one, the LLBO will not continue to issue special occasion licences to individual campus groups, Brown said.

A newly-formed association of pub managers from universities across Ontario has written to the government protesting the new LLBO regulations.

In a letter to Consumer and Commercial Relations minister John Clements, the association outlined its fear that a university administration in control of on-campus pubs could at any time "and without warning" withdraw the "privilege" of drinking, which would constitute "an infringement on our right of self-determination."

"A university could choose to turn our pub operations into profit-oriented services in order to increase sagging revenues. We would then see our fellow students paying the same high prices they would have to in any other drinking establishment."

U of T administration services director Alex Malcolm does not feel the new legislation "will change present operations that much, although I see it through a glass darkly."

"The university has to be the licensee because it owns the building. Right now student organizations must have the consent of the administration to run a pub."

He did admit, however, that under the new law the administration could, for example, regulate when and how drinks could be served, and what the drinks could be.

"The regulations under the bill aren't clear and we will have to have further meetings (with the LLBO)," Brown added.

Province sponsors loans for part-timers

By ANDREW FALUDY

Two new programs sponsored by the provincial government to assist part-time students came into operation this fall.

Previously only a small minority of the U of T's 9,000 part-time undergraduates have received any financial assistance. This money came from the university because under the federal Canada Student Loan Act, only full-time students are eligible for financial aid.

The two new schemes provide loans and bursaries to part-time students and both are experimental.

Provincially - guaranteed loans are available for all students enrolled in credit courses at public post-secondary institutions and who meet Ontario residence requirements.

U of T students are eligible for these loans which can total as much as twice the tuition fee of each course, a minimum of $100 to a maximum of $200. Under this scheme a student could borrow up to $600 - the government provides only for three courses.

Repayment of the loan starts either 10 months after registration or two months after the end of the course and the rate interest is a somewhat ungenerous 10%.

The second scheme, which is a pilot bursary program offers a better financial deal but is more limited in scope. There are as yet no plans to implement it at the U of T.

This would appear to be on the surface at least a very good deal for the students at the selected universities, but only $300,000 in funds has been allocated to the project. The emphasis is that the scheme is only experimental anyway, and additional funds are not available.

The ministry of colleges and education would not say what plans there are to enlarge or extend the scheme, merely asserting that it is as yet far too early to make any decisions, as the results of the initial series of bursaries have not as yet been fully analysed.

Part-time students at the selected colleges and universities can apply through their universities for the bursaries.

Unless the scheme is extended to the U of T, which is not under consideration at the moment, the only financial assistance that the U of T's 9,000 part-time students can obtain is the provincial loan or the few bursaries and awards offered by the Division of University Extension. These vary from $40 to $500 but there are less than thirty available annually.

Former deadbeats flocking back to academia

The university life appears to be attracting people who in the past few years had decided not to return to the halls of academe.

All those past dropouts from school and society appear to be heading back on the road toward normal life again. Or so the government says.

The latest ministry of colleges and universities newsletter announces that, despite a drop in grade 13 enrolment in the past two years, there is an increase in first-year enrolment of almost five per cent in Ontario universities.

And these souls are well on their way to the "good life," as the ministry notes an increase in enrolments in professional and career-oriented courses. Enrolments in commerce and finance and engineering faculties are up in several Ontario universities.

"Many stop-outs who took time out between high school and university have resumed their studies with career-oriented goals which are reflected in their choice of programs," the newsletter noted.

The ministry also reported on a survey of Ontario grade 12 students and discovered that of those surveyed about 30 per cent intend to go to university, 19 per cent to community colleges, while 21 per cent intend to enter the work force. Another nine per cent plan to take time off to become the dropouts of tomorrow.

The survey also noted that a majority of those intending to go to community colleges were females who saw themselves as having little chance of successfully completing a university career. Correspondingly, those intending to enter university were male, usually from urban centers. "This group of students also has fathers with more prestigious positions and tends to aspire to higher prestige positions themselves."

The report quickened our heartbeats further by announcing "major" changes in the ministry organization. The ministry has expanded to include applied arts and technology institutions and industrial training.

"In order to meet increasing demands for service from colleges, universities and other groups, a major organizational change has been implemented," the newsletter stated.

To handle all major policy decisions, a management committee has been created consisting of minister Jack McNie, his deputy minister and parliamentary assistant and the heads of the four major divisions of the ministry, University Affairs, College Affairs and Manpower, Cultural Affairs and Common Services. The College Affairs and Manpower Training Division is the amalgamation of the former Applied Art and Technology and Industrial Training branches of the ministry.

The University Affairs Division, the most important of the sub-strata, is the division that deals with most university policy, and relations between universities and the provincial government.

Student apathy caused by powerlessness

The bankruptcy of decision-making structures in the faculty of Arts and Science has never been more clearly demonstrated than at last week's Faculty Council meeting. The heavily faculty-dominated council (although some students are permitted) managed to muster its first quorum in three years and proceeded to vote down the formation of a new body to take over some of the functions of the Academic Standards Committee.

This sub-committee, which meets in secret, has ultimate responsibility for approving courses and grading policy within the faculty. Though dean Bob Greene has used this committee less than his predecessors, the fact that it still exists is an insult to students.

But this is not surprising in a faculty where students are systematically excluded from all important decision-making bodies. The myth of student participation has been perpetuated by the inclusion of 52 students on the faculty's General Committee. This 200 member committee is supposedly the main decision-making authority in the faculty. However it has floundered for the past few years, for the most part unable to reach decisions on even the smallest question and lacking the legitimacy of any significant student involvement.

This decline in student interest is a direct result of the unsuccessful parity struggle of 1970-71. Students voted overwhelmingly in favour of staff - student parity on the council and the general committee, but a subsequent campaign which included an occupation and an unsuccessful strike vote failed to move the intransigent faculty members who wanted to retain their dominant position.

Students realistically apathetic

Now few student members even bother to attend meetings. This is symptomatic of their complete powerlessness; they have undoubtedly realized that any remotely progressive changes will be frustrated by the faculty majority. The maze of committees that come under the General Committee do nothing to improve the situation.

The elections for the student seats demonstrate the complete lack of representivity of these bodies. Last year most student members were acclaimed, and only five per cent of those eligible to vote bothered to do so in the mailed ballot elections.

Some faculty also appear unhappy

The situation among faculty members is even bleaker. Many of the faculty who support a position of more student input and are interested in challenging the status quo in arts and science have been alienated from decision-making processes. Like the students, they have been constantly frustrated by faculty members who feel that the university should be run as an "elitist" institution with control by a small top-heavy body of senior faculty and administrators.

For the last few years some faculty members have been able to frustrate even moderate proposals for structural reforms. Most of the power remains behind the scenes with important educational decisions on matters such as curriculum and staffing being made by small groups of senior faculty within each department. The departmental chairmen have the lion's share of power, making budgetary decisions in consultation with the dean. This process takes place behind closed doors with not an overt hint of student consultation.

There are a few exceptions to this, such as the sociology department where students have parity on the departmental assembly and are involved in staffing decisions. But this is not commonplace. More typical are the mathematics and political economy departments where students have been systematically excluded from decision-making.

Math chairman George Duff was instrumental last year in the denial of tenure to two popular professors and even a massive petition campaign and an occupation couldn't bend his determination to exclude students from effecting changes in the so-called "service courses" and securing basic reforms in departmental decision-making structures.

Course unions might as well run pubs

Unfortunately there has been little action to challenge the departmental hierarchies. Course Unions have declined to a point where most are content to run course evaluations. Last year's math struggle was a grass roots movement that took place in spite of the largely inactive MPSCU. There are few students involved in the few course unions that still exist; and they only exist in eight of 26 arts and science departments.

This decline is symptomatic of the lack of student participation in the departments. The complete frustration of any past attempts to gain greater student say in matters directly concerning their education has led to a feeling of pessimism that pervades the course union activities. And not surprisingly the type of students involved in course unions have increasingly become less interested in trying to achieve basic reforms channelling their interest into service functions such as course evaluations and running lounges that have little effect on the quality of education.

Change from the top is a lost cause within the faculty. The new program review recommendations which attempted to offer some moderate reforms have been frustrated by the council and the general committee. The credit system was voted down last May and any restructuring of the committees would have to pass through the completely unrepresentative council. Any change will have to be pressed for outside these antiquated and irrelevant structures.

Some students have pointed to the Governing Council as a means of trying to circumvent the unrepresentative structures in arts and science. But it should be evident that we can hardly expect that body, with only eight students out of 50 members, to interfere in the internal affairs of arts and science. The Governing Council has ultimate authority but it is safe to conclude that the faculty and their corporate friends would frustrate any attempts to challenge the faculty domination in arts and science. Any hopes of pro-student decisions by the Governing Council are pure fantasy.

In the face of this rather dismal situation, with students frustrated at every turn, there are several alternatives for those students and faculty who are concerned with challenging the dominance of the few conservative senior faculty who have effectively consolidated power in the past few years.

Unfortunately the Arts and Science Student Union does not seem equal to the task. In its second year the union is still basically a funding body concerning itself with the few course unions in operation. Faculty council and college representatives have not actively participated and it seems doubtful that this situation is likely to change.

The fact is that a constituent organization such as ASSU depends upon its member organizations and since the course unions, faculty council representatives and college student reps are showing little interest, the organization is going nowhere. Students do not identify with their faculty and sometimes not even their department. They identify with their respective colleges, if at all on this vast campus.

Dilemma might be resolved

The only answer for this dilemma is for concerned students to form a coalition with remnants of the dormant "faculty reform caucus" to press for change at departmental and faculty wide levels, outside the present structures which co-opt students and legitimize completely undemocratic and unresponsive decision making processes. The maze of committees in arts and science should be exposed for what they are, the means for perpetuating power in the hands of a few to maintain the status quo.

An effective student voice in grading policies, course content, examination procedure, hiring, firing and tenure decisions is only possible through a concerted effort to challenge the existing power relationships. In the past students have learned that the only way to exert pressure is to confront the small clique of conservative faculty and administrators.

We are only playing their game by spending our time sitting on committees with no effective voice and contenting ourselves with doing course evaluations and setting up various student bureaucracies. The answer is for students to organize with sympathetic faculty to publicize inequities and injustices on a departmental and faculty wide level. More time should be spent organizing on a grass roots level so that some sort of direct action is possible on individual issues, such as the math struggle last year. When the time comes to negotiate with those who hold power it must be on an equal basis, not institutionalized in some sort of advisory committee.

Students have a right and the power to do something about the quality of education. We hope that they can avoid the pitfalls of getting co-opted by a repressive system that is designed to prevent change instead of acting as a constructive force, allowing students and faculty to make the decisions that directly affect their lives.

Evans: I wanna bite your neck

Dr. John Evans poses as Frankenstein during a 1948 production of Daffydl at U of T. Rumor has it that he will don his old costume today and pay a visit to the Red Cross Halloween Blood Donor Clinic being held from 10 am to 4 pm at Upper Brennan Hall in St. Mike's. At midnight, Dr. John is scheduled to turn into a pumpkin, which shouldn't be too much of a problem, since pumpkins always get tenure.

Demonstration for Chile solidarity

November 4 has been called as an International Day of Solidarity with Chile. Actions are expected to take place in many countries of the world.

Such a demonstration of international solidarity is critical at this point in time. The military coup has inflicted a serious defeat on the workers and peasants of Chile. While they regroup in order to continue the resistance they are dependent on international support to help shift the balance of forces against the junta.

The brutal repression in Chile continues. Many political prisoners are still being held, some subject to torture, summary trial and execution. Basic democratic rights have been abrogated, workers organization and political parties have been banned, the press is censored, the universities have been brought under military control.

Many governments have granted recognition and aid to the ruling military junta. Canada and corporations such as De Havilland are providing this type of support. Canada has also refused to open wide its embassy doors to Chileans and grant them full rights of asylum in this country.

On November 4 there will be substantial actions in Vancouver, Montreal and other major Canadian centres. In Toronto the Canadian Committee for a Democratic Chile has called a public meeting at 7:30 at Convocation Hall. The Chile Solidarity Committee supports this type of public meeting and encourages people to attend. However, it feels that other forms of solidarity such as a public demonstration are important. It has therefore called a demonstration for November 4, to assemble at 2:00 p.m. at Allan Gardens. The Committee's slogans for the demonstration are Solidarity with Chilean Workers and Peasants

No Aid to the Junta
Rescind Recognition
Free Political Prisoners
Asylum for Exiles
End the Repression
All concerned groups and individuals are urged to participate.

Fac Ass'n offers help to Salaff

In your issue of Monday, October 22, in your story (page 3) about Mr. Salaff's appeal to President Evans, there are a couple of errors of fact about the Faculty Association which I think I must bring to your attention.

Mr. Salaff is quoted as saying the Faculty Association had "given him no support." He is also alleged to have said that the Faculty Association does not allow non-tenured staff members to join. Mr. Salaff is either misquoted or mistaken on these points. It is perhaps technically true that the Faculty Association has not supported his appeal, but he, in fact, has never asked our Grievance Committee to take up his case. As to the second point, the Faculty Association has hundreds of non-tenured members. It may be that Mr. Salaff was really referring here to part-time staff members. It is true that part-time members below a certain salary cannot join the Association without approval of our Council. The services of our Grievance Committee, however, are fully available to all members of the teaching staff: full-time, part-time, tenured and non-tenured. We would be glad even now to take up Mr. Salaff's case if he asked us to do so.

Judge Israel like other nations

Prof. L. M. Kenny (and 12 others) obviously misunderstood the letter (October 26) signed by Fr. Kelly (and 12 others), since he interprets the first letter as a plea to support Zionism "willy-nilly, to the utter disregard of the wrongs done in the process to the Arabs, the original innocent bystanders." This is not in the least the argument of our letter (I am one of the 12 other persons), as a simple examination will demonstrate. Our letter argues that Israel is subject to the same moral criteria "derived from the canons of international justice and the conscience of rational man" as any other nation. Our letter also analyzes the Arab-Israeli struggle as a "tragic encounter of two peoples, each with legitimate claims and aspirations, over the same territory." This is hardly a case of omitting or glossing over Arab rights, as Prof. Kenny declares.

The point made in the letter to which Prof. Kenny objects is that Israel should be judged in exactly the same terms as other nations, and not judged in terms of a mythology imposed on Israel by the rhetoric of anti-Zionism: a rhetoric which Prof. Kenny appears to endorse.

Prof. Kenny also accuses us of "anti-semitic prejudice" against the Arabs, because the Arabs too are semites. Of course, the Arabs are semites. But the term 'anti-semitism' (a misnomer) has nothing to do with Arabs whatever; its true meaning is 'Judenhass' (hatred of Jews), and it was coined by an anti-semitic who wished to identify the Jews as a race, thereby twisting a linguistic category into a racial category. If Prof. Kenny is accusing us of 'hatred of Arabs', the charge is utterly false.

Big John is watching you

Welcome to the John P. Roberts Maximum Security Library.

Due to the high rate of theft of library books and the cost involved in replacing them, the Library employs several security guards.

You are all under suspicion of theft, and must subject yourselves to search. You are to open to view all carrying cases so that security guards can make sure you aren't thieves.

Library administrators, needless to say, are not subject to such inspection since they are incorruptible.

Private study rooms on the upper floors have windows built into their doors; if you think the purpose of this is to let more light in, you are grossly mistaken. By virtue of the windows it is hoped that students will think twice about copulating, meeting to plot revolution, and so forth.

The doors to the offices of library administrators, needless to say, do not have windows, since the moral uprightness of library administrators is beyond suspicion.

There are control points in the Roberts Library; the purpose of these, low and behold, is to control you.

Who can tell what other wonders are contained within the walls of the Roberts Library?

Socialism caused ITT monstrosity

I definitely do not want to give the impression I support ITT, but your "ad" on October 15 deserves some critical comment. ITT is a poor example of a capitalist firm that "made it" in the open free enterprise system. On the contrary, it is a giant monster because it has benefited from the North American brand of socialism, now practised for several decades. ITT has made its profits and obtained its influence through an insidious alliance between business and government. It has been granted privileged status in a highly lucrative field (communications) and protected by government fiat from competition. Thus it has grown into a monopoly because of the usurpation of the capitalist process. Special government contracts, leases and subsidies throughout the years have made ITT a mammoth tentacle of the state, not in the least unlike the state-run communications networks of fascist and Communist countries. True, ITT is privately owned, but ownership without control is a useless contradiction. The owners of ITT are indistinguishable from the politicians — they are one and the same.

The answer is not to nationalize; that will change nothing. We must "privatize" — open competition and return to a full, libertarian laissez-faire state of existence where state and economy are kept thoroughly separate. I believe in the morality of freely-obtained profit. Profits are not made by high prices. There is an optimal price level from which, if prices are raised or lowered, losses will result.

Thus, if a company's profits were frozen or abolished, (as I'm dead certain is the desire of you anti-capitalists) prices would rise. A profitable company could slightly lower prices, but that would very likely increase profits. This is the natural capitalist process and it is insanely redundant to put control over it. But if prices were cut too far, the company would go bankrupt, unable to pay its workers and suppliers with disastrous results for all of society.

On the other hand, it would reduce profits if it raised prices, thus reducing sales volume. Less goods and money are exchanged in society. This collapse of commerce leads immediately to a decline in the standard of living. If it is really rapid, by the way, it can precipitate a full-scale depression. Anyone can see that we are better off in a free-price system. (Wage, price, profit or wage controls are uniformly disastrous.) So who do the plans of the anti-profiteers benefit? Absolutely no one, except the Marxist theoreticians who cling to their irrational dogma, blinded by an impotent hatred for successful man.

What ITT had to say in that advertisement about profits is true. The only (and valid) point of criticism is that they don't come by theirs' honestly. Don't use ITT as an example to denigrate capitalism, the only moral system for free rational men to live under.

Varg staff proves students inept

I am writing to protest the scurrilous attack on Mr. Ivey made in a recent Varsity editorial (October 22).

Apparently, Mr. Ivey provoked this abuse by suggesting that most students are not competent to decide who should or should not be hired by the university.

The Varsity staff, rather than present a rational rebuttal of Mr. Ivey's arguments, as they should have if they thought they were wrong, have instead resorted to the cheapest and most malicious form of attack found in journalism — slander.

Instead of a discussion of issues, we are presented with an attack on personalities. The attack on Mr. Ivey's character (we are asked to believe that his desire for publicity has motivated all his recent actions) is offered as proof that his ideas are false. The logic of this escapes me.

By writing such an absurd editorial, The Varsity staff have already gone a long way towards proving Mr. Ivey's case, namely, that some students lack the intelligence and maturity to make responsible decisions. We may hope, however, in our own defense, that the editorial staff of The Varsity is not representative of the students this university has to offer.

The university administration can no longer afford to ignore those students who demand equal representation on hiring committees. They should respond, as Mr. Ivey has done, by stating their position on this issue. Only by taking a firm, consistent stand on this and other issues will the administration secure the confidence and respect of the majority of students—those who are not interested in subverting the university community.

The inaccuracy of D. W. Patterson's letter was extensive even by Varsity standards.

The engineers did not try to sell Kraft cheese, Dare cookies and California grapes. They did sell them. Six full bags of cookies were divided into bite size quantities and the entire stock that the engineers had available was soon sold. The cheese and grapes soon followed.

The student community who, we are told, supports these assorted boycotts bought all of these products.

The BFC believes that these sales amply prove that the rumoured student wide support of the boycotts is another example of the mass media creating a false impression.

The reported "grapes taste better when little children pick them" shall not even be dignified by a comment.

Finally the BFC would like to deny that anyone has donated $5,000 to U of T engineering because of this incident. The gift was not related.

Everyone guilty in Middle East

Given the way in which Professor Kenny and his colleagues read last week's letter on Christian responsibility and the crisis in the Near East, it is understandable that they would write in protest. But that letter is neither so simple-minded nor so insensitive as they took it to be. If they would read it again, and more carefully, they would find that some of their points were anticipated in it—and that others are quite wide of the mark. That letter did not endorse Zionism, but repudiated anti-Zionism; it did not belittle the plight of Palestinian refugees, but maintained that this is not an adequate justification for the destruction of Israel; and it did not urge that Christians withdraw from attempts to mediate a peace, but that they withdraw from any sense of a Christian mandate to impose one or to dictate its terms. It is quite true that no hands are clean in this affair, and that guilt lies everywhere. All, including Israel, must take responsibility for their own guilt. The guilt that is specifically Christian has to do far more with the legitimacy of Zionism than with the irresponsibility of the Balfour Declaration. To admit this fact of moral history does not imply a casual disregard of Arab claims, and should not be so taken. The charge of an anti-Arab bias is a serious one. I do not think that a careful reading of the letter in question would find grounds for making it.

Election Quebec 73

LADY SPECIAL REPORT LADY

Under the landslide: a new game with old rules

"But what good came of it at last?"
Quoth little Peterkin.

"Why, that I cannot tell," said he;
"But 'twas a famous victory."

—Robert Southey

For some, there was little doubt about what good came of it. Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau said that "if this were a referendum, federalism would have obviously carried the day and we would not hear any more talk of separatism. I have always been convinced that the vast majority of Quebecers would prefer federalism over separatism."

He declared the result a serious setback to separatism, and many of his English Canadian colleagues hastened to agree. Among them were federal NDP leader David Lewis, and NDP premiers Blakeney of Saskatchewan and Barrett of British Columbia.

These reactions were quick, but they bore little relation to what had actually happened. The October 29 general election in Quebec was, of course, a substantial victory for Premier Robert Bourassa and his Liberal party. But the NDP notables at least, and even Prime Minister Trudeau, should have known better. They should have entertained some qualms about what that victory represented, and how it was obtained.

And beyond that, even if the Liberal sweep at times seemed complete, the election was far from being a total defeat for the Parti Québécois, which will now form the official opposition in Quebec's National Assembly.

In terms of the popular vote, the PQ attained the objective it had set for itself of 30 per cent, up six per cent from the 1970 election. For that to have been translated into a substantial gain in seats, third and fourth parties would have had to maintain a presence in the election, allowing Péquistes to slip through in three- and four-way races. Instead, both the Parti Crétitiste and the Union Nationale collapsed beyond anyone's expectations.

The result is the sharpest polarization of its politics Quebec has known in a long time. On one side stand the Liberals, representing unfettered free enterprise, increased foreign investment, and a tight federal connection; on the other stands the PQ, representing increased social welfare, state intervention in the economy, and political and economic sovereignty.

They met head on, and this time the first option has won. In some parts of Quebec, the margin between the two is still substantial; in others it is slight. In the latter category are the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean region, where the PQ took a seat for the first time, the North Shore of the St. Lawrence river, where Péquiste Lucien Lessard retained his Saguenay seat, Montreal's South Shore, where two ridings were Liberal-PQ toss-ups the day after the election, and the east end of Montreal, where the PQ and the Liberals won approximately equal votes.

Even in the two east-end seats that were taken from them by the Liberals, the PQ substantially increased its share of the vote over last time. Guy Joron won Gouin in 1970 with 41 per cent of the vote, but lost it in 1973 with 45 per cent, while Dr. Camille Laurin, who had taken Bourget in 1970 with only 40 per cent of the vote, lost it this time with 46 per cent. The difference was the total disappearance of the Crétitiste and particularly the Union Nationale vote, and its migration toward the Liberals.

The Liberals, then, won their victory not at the expense of the PQ but at the expense of the Union Nationale and the Parti Crétitiste.

But it's not quite that simple either.

There was, in fact, no real Union Nationale or Crétitiste campaign on Montreal Island. In some ridings both on and off the island, the PQ has charged that there was collusion between the Liberals and the Union Nationale; the Union Nationale, as the official opposition in the last National Assembly, had the right to name poll clerks; in many ridings, the UN simply abdicated this right to the Liberals.

(Then there was the lucrative Loto-Perfecta distributorship that Roberte Dupuis, wife of Crétitiste leader Yvon Dupuis, held in partnership with disgraced Liberal organizer René Gagnon. According to Dupuis — although not according to Bourassa — the contract was personally awarded to Mme Dupuis by the premier.)

As the tiny official opposition to what is sure to be a haughty and unresponsive government, the Péquistes face a difficult task. It is made no easier by the loss Stories researched and written by Nick Auf der Maur, Andre Dufresne and Robert Chodos.

René Lévesque's Parti Québécois placed more emphasis on economic sovereignty than on political separation of two of their more effective parliamentarians in Laurin and Joron, and the party's failure to elect any of its Big Three of René Lévesque, Jacques Parizeau and Claude Morin. Even more of the weight than before will fall on the shoulders of Robert Burns, the former trade-union lawyer who retained his seat with a comfortable majority. It was Burns who broke the dam on the scandals involving former Liberal Labour Minister Pierre Laporte, and he should have plenty of opportunity to follow through on that attack in the next Assembly.

While Burns speaks for the left wing of the PQ, the party's right will also have a strong voice in Jacques-Yvan Morin, former head of the Estates-General of French Canada, newly elected in Sauvé riding. As a compromise, the position of parliamentary Leader of the Opposition is expected to go to Marcel Léger, a successful small businessman who was re-elected in Lafontaine.

In 1970, PQ leader René Lévesque spoke to a massive, cheering crowd in Montreal's east-end Paul Sauvé arena after the party had taken a stunning — for that election — 24 per cent of the popular vote and said that "this is a defeat that has something of the air of a victory."

There was again a crowd in the Paul Sauvé arena on October 29, but its mood was different. Defeated candidates cried on each other's shoulders. Lévesque himself was subdued.

They may not have known it then, but for the PQ this Quebec election could turn out to be a victory that had something of the air of a defeat.

Marcel Léger, expected to be the new Leader of the Opposition Quebec: Watergate North?

Ever since 1960, John Kennedy's successful presidential campaign has been the most popular model for electoral strategists all over the world. Robert Bourassa's Quebec Liberals, however, seem to have been considerably more impressed with Richard Nixon's campaign of 1972.

Like Nixon, they held an exaggerated view of the threat to their remaining in office and took exaggerated measures to meet that threat. Like Nixon, they ended up with a huge, and perhaps unwieldy, majority on election day. And like Nixon, they may find that their mandate is not nearly so strong as they believed it to be.

Just as Watergate remained an undercurrent all through 1972, with little overt effect on the campaign, so the Quebec campaign had its own undercurrent of dirty tricks, irregular electoral lists, and American-style political bugging. Some of the incidents were in the best

Quebec tradition: one Parti Québécois scrutineer reported seeing voters come to the polls claiming to live at addresses of buildings he knew to have been demolished. Other tactics, however, were straight out of the era of Howard Hunt and Gordon Liddy.

The election was conceived in scandal, as the months just before its calling were dominated by the Laporte affair, Quebec's own Pandora's Box of revelations, leaks, charges and counter-charges. On September 25, the Quebec Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime, which the government had carefully been trying to steer away from probing into the dealings of the late Labour Minister Pierre Laporte and other Liberals with the underworld, convened briefly after its summer break and then adjourned again until mid-November. That same night Bourassa announced the dissolution of the National Assembly and the calling of the October 29 election.

On election night, Justice Minister Jérôme Choquette said that the Crime Commission would pursue its inquiry vigorously, in much the tone of President Nixon announcing that the new special Watergate prosecutor would have full White House co-operation.

Another Nixonian touch was the careful packaging and sealing of Premier Bourassa that characterized the Liberal campaign. He concentrated on radio and TV and avoided much contact with the press. Statements by the premier and other Liberal luminaries and candidates were recorded on cassettes twice a day and made available to local radio stations. Newspapersmen also had to rely on the cassettes for information. As one reporter put it, "you can't ask a cassette any questions."

When Bourassa attended rallies, all was studiously orchestrated. His personal hairdresser accompanied him everywhere and made him up five and six times a day. Other stage managers always positioned the news cameras to his right, insuring that all photos and film would only capture his "good profile".

But the real Liberal campaign started last May when the government put into effect its new permanent electoral list. This law put control of the compilation of the electoral list into the hands of the governing Liberal party and the official opposition at the time, the Union Nationale.

The result was that thousands of eligible voters were left off the list, while the names of thousands of non-citizen immigrants were included, mostly in the central Montreal area. Needless to say, the immigrant vote went heavily Liberal, as it always does.

There were some 113,000 demands for revision of the electoral list in the Montreal area alone, most of them organized by the PQ. Of those, more than 74,000 were complaints by people who said they had been left off the electoral list — in the 1970 election, there had been only 80,000 such complaints in the whole province.

Many of the demands were accepted, but enough were rejected to affect the results in some close ridings. In the central Montreal riding of Mercier, where Premier Bourassa fought off a strong challenge from l'Abbé Louis O'Neill of the PQ, 1,450 PQ complaints of ineligible voters on the list were rejected. That figure represented almost three quarters of the premier's election-night majority.

Another of Bourassa's dubious electoral adventures backfired on the premier. This was a campaign book extolling the benefits that would arise from the James Bay project. The Indians of Quebec Association, which has filed suit for an injunction stopping the project, took the position that the publication of the book could conceivably prejudice their case. Chief Justice Jules Deschênes of Quebec Superior Court thought they had a point, and ordered the premier to appear before him.

Bourassa tried to claim executive privilege — Nixon again — but was no more successful in this than his American counterpart, and the court turned him down. No date has yet been set for Bourassa's court appearance.

Yvon Dupuis, whose failure to build the Cr ditistes into a credible force was a major factor in the Liberal sweep ance.

Perhaps the most serious allegation made against the Liberals in the campaign was that they had authorized secret electronic surveillance of political opponents. Jean-Pierre Charbonneau of Le Devoir, who has been the recipient of a flood of police leaks over the last few months, revealed that officials of the nationalist St. Jean Baptiste Society in Montreal had been bugged by the Quebec Provincial Police.

At the same time, La Presse revealed the existence of a secret government agency, called the Centre for Analysis and Documentation (CAS), reporting directly to the premier and charged with delving into subversive activities and violations of national security. One of the sources of information for CAS is, of course, the Quebec Provincial Police.

The transcripts of the SJBS tapes were part of a top secret file called "Quebec-95", which, according to Charbonneau's police sources, is a "political" dossier of information on "movements of national influence" in Quebec. Again according to the police sources, "Quebec-95" is not an isolated case.

In other words, the police are bugging not only supposedly "terrorist" groups but moderate, conservative nationalist organizations like the St. Jean Baptiste Society. And the police are also supplying information to a top-secret government body, responsible directly to Premier Bourassa.

Furthermore, Charbonneau said that the bugging of the SJBS was directed primarily toward "finding out the links tying the St. Jean Baptiste Society to the independentist movement and more particularly to the Parti Québécois."

All this only began to come out toward the end of the campaign, and thus few details are available and conclusions are necessarily uncertain. Once again, however, the pattern of a regime with an extreme fear of its political opponents emerges.

Just a year ago, at the time of his re-election, President Richard Nixon was unchallenged and seemed unchallengeable. One year later, there is considerable doubt about whether he will be able to finish out his term.

It is not beyond possibility that the same thing will happen to Robert Bourassa.

There were at least three different varieties of "Lévesque dollar" issued during the campaign. This one was the work of the Liberal Party.

'The premier's electoral cynicism has no limit'

(from an article by Gilbert Athot in the large Quebec City daily Le Soleil, July 28, 1973, two months before the election was called)

The electoral cynicism of Mr. Robert Bourassa appears to have attained heights which few politicians will be able to equal in the future....

One of the most revealing examples occurred recently during a visit the premier made to the hydroelectric construction sites at James Bay, accompanied by a number of journalists.

Several of the reporters were dumbfounded witnesses to the following incident. Mr. Bourassa sat down at a table with some workers and began to eat an ear of corn, to show that he could put himself at the same level as simple working men and eat with them.

Suddenly, after only a few seconds, he said to the television cameramen who were filming him: "Do you have enough?" He got up right away, and didn't sit down again. He had done enough to take care of his electoral image ... to a point where some found it indecent....

In fact, the premier's electoral cynicism has no limit. He will go so far as to ask a minister to modify paragraphs in his letter of resignation so that he will be able to "cover" himself politically later on.

There is also the case of the minister of justice, Mr. Jérôme Choquette, whom the premier allowed to be seen as a sort of legalistic hardliner in the matter of the jailing of the three labour leaders, while Bourassa himself did not discourage rumours concerning his own supposed greater breadth of spirit. The same strategy was seen in the Laporte affair. Mr. Choquette had to play the villain for several weeks, while Mr. Bourassa kept the good-guy role for himself.

For the premier, to humiliate or to break an MNA or a minister, as he did in the case of the MNA Alfred Bossé on the taxi issue, and the minister Jean-Paul l'Allier during the public service conflict, doesn't weigh heavily if the image of his party can gain something from it....

Bourassa: 'Waiting for the good will of foreigners'

Unilaterally, the English-language press of Quebec declared a confrontation of federalism versus separatism.

"Separatism the only issue in focus," said a Montreal Gazette headline the Saturday before the October 29 vote. "Federalism goes to the test Monday," said a Montreal Star headline the same day. On election day, the Star trumpeted that the future of a nation was at stake.

It was an interpretation very much at odds with the impression that Parti Québécois leader René Lévesque, for one, had taken great pains to create. If it was easy for the English to see the election in the stark terms of federalism versus separatism, on the French side the view of what was involved tended to be a lot more complex.

Most of the serious content of the campaign was contained in what the French-language press called "la guerre des chiffres" — the war of figures.

Whether the details of the chiffres that the Liberals and the PQ presented were of any help to the voter in making up his mind is dubious. But the interpretations each party presented reflected different approaches to economic development that were made extremely clear during the campaign and were at the root of what was at issue in the election.

The war of figures dates back to the latter stages of the previous Quebec election campaign, in 1970. At that time the federal Liberal party, as its intervention in the campaign, issued a document that purported to show that Quebec got more out of Confederation than it put in. The PQ answered with its own figures, which it claimed showed precisely the opposite.

Fought on that basis, it was a war nobody could win, since each economist has his own definition of what should be included in such a calculation and what left out. And although that battle continued through the 1973 campaign, it was overshadowed by another, more genuine debate: the PQ argued that Quebec had the economic strength to go it alone, not just in terms of political independence but without the heavy dependence on foreign capital that characterizes its economy, while the Liberals insisted that the only way Quebec could expand economically was to continue to try to attract multinational corporations to the province at whatever price and by whatever means necessary.

"In Mr. Bourassa's opinion," reported the Montreal daily La Presse after interviewing both the premier and René Lévesque on the subject of what Quebec would be like in ten years. "Quebec in ten years could be as rich as Ontario or even richer, mostly because of the overflowing natural resources that are waiting only for the good will of foreigners to be developed.

"I have in my hands," explains Mr. Bourassa, "an untold reservoir of economic power that I intend to develop to death for the profit of Quebecers, whether it's hydroelectric power, petroleum, mines; with foreign capital, because I don't have any of my own. As soon as I have indigenous capital, I will take that capital."

In a campaign speech in the North Shore boom-town of Sept-Îles, Bourassa said that "if we didn't have the investment of multinational corporations what we would see would be an exodus of young people from this area and we can't allow that to happen...."

"In some cases we have resources which force them to come here, but in many cases we are competing with Ontario, the Maritimes and the U.S. and they don't have to come. If they're taxed to the limit they won't come."

He noted that the province has "137,000 young people coming out the labour market every year. In 1979, when the growth of the labour force decreases considerably, we will need less foreign investment than we do now, but what choice do we have at the moment?"

The attitude toward foreign capital determined the rest of the Liberal policy. "Stability" was a key word in the Liberal campaign. The federal connection was to be maintained on the basis of "le fédéralisme rentable" — profitable federalism, surely one of the less uplifting slogans on which a country has been based. Union militancy would be severely dealt with, although the premier toned down his anti-labour stance in the latter stages of the campaign after it elicited a negative reaction from his audiences and the disapproval of his own labour minister. The Parti Québécois's demands for independence were met with a promise of "cultural sovereignty" — a tacit admission that economic and political control would be abdicated to others.

It was a policy whose lineage owed more to Maurice Duplessis, the Union Nationale chef of the 'forties and 'fifties, than to Bourassa's Liberal predecessor Jean Lesage. And in the best Duplessis tradition, Bourassa stumped the province in the last days of the campaign and exhorted voters to vote "du bon bord" — on the winning side. "It's more convenient to have a deputy 'du bon bord' than in the Opposition," he explained to voters in Sainte-Marie-de-Beauce.

In contrast, the Parti Québécois hesitantly offered a program of economic sovereignty.

It was the PQ that took most of the initiatives in the war of figures. Early in the campaign, in an elaborate presentation designed to resemble an official budget speech, Lévesque and the PQ's chief financial expert Jacques Parizeau presented the party's budget for the first year of independence. Later, Parizeau released a government document of great significance that had been leaked to the PQ — Quebec's national accounts for the last twenty-five years.

As this PQ newspaper ad indicated, a vote for the PQ in 1973 was not so much a vote for independence as a willingness to consider it.

Both events attracted wide publicity, although their ultimate electoral wisdom was a subject of debate in the election-night post mortems. They both made clear that the PQ was staking out an economic territory considerably to the left of that occupied by Premier Bourassa. But particularly in the area where Bourassa was so explicit, the attitude toward foreign capital, the PQ policy contained an element of vagueness — perhaps, for electoral purposes, a deliberate one.

The economic argument

In the budget, which repatriated to Quebec all the revenues collected within its borders and redirected federal expenditures such as defence into a variety of social measures, the PQ foresaw little change in the level of foreign investment in Quebec. It included little in the way of a reduction in the tax advantages held by large corporations; in the party's own description, PQ government would effect "the disappearance of part of the fiscal privileges of certain categories of enterprises."

Eric Kierans, Lévesque's former colleague in the Lesage Liberal government of the early sixties, commented that "the Parti Québécois intends to superimpose democratic socialism on an unchanged private capitalist system of production. This is a neat trick but it cannot be done. Nor is it democratic socialism. If the corporate community were to buy the soothing syrup of no increases in taxes — don't hold your breath on this — the burden of financing the expanded social services would then fall directly on personal incomes."

In its interpretation of the national accounts, however, the PQ gave evidence of a considerably greater breadth of economic vision.

The national accounts did not perhaps have the impact they deserved. The PQ had released so many documents showing Quebec at an economic disadvantage that many people thought this was just another salvo in the sterile debate over whether federalism is or is not rentable.

It was, in fact, something quite different. It was a portrait of the Quebec economy that showed that over the last twenty-five years Quebec had been a net exporter of capital to the tune of $10 billion — in other words, said the PQ, Quebec had more than enough capital to finance its own development.

Lévesque said a PQ government would take steps to "channel this surplus of capital" back into the Quebec economy. It would admit foreign capital on the government's terms, and not on its own terms as advocated by the Bourassa Liberals.

These differing economic policies represented a deeper difference between the two parties than the federalism-versus-separatism dichotomy posed by Montreal's English papers. Although the PQ has not wavered in its stated commitment to political sovereignty for Quebec, that particular plank in its platform, once the very basis for its existence, has occupied a lower and lower position on its scale of priorities.

The independence policy

A vote for the PQ in 1973 was not so much a vote for independence as a willingness to consider it. "Today, I'm voting for the only party ready to form a real government," said a PQ ad that appeared in every French paper in the province just before the election. "In 1975, by referendum, I will decide on the future of Quebec. One thing at a time! Everything in its own time."

The clear statement that independence would be undertaken only after a referendum was a departure from the PQ's previous position, and also from a plank in the official party platform. There was, however, another plank in the platform that said that the constitution of an independent Quebec would be decided by a referendum. Since it would be impossible to proclaim independence without a constitution, that gave Lévesque the out he needed to tell voters nothing precipitous would happen the morning after a PQ victory.

Another PQ ad said, "On October 30, if the Parti Québécois was elected the previous day, Quebec will still be a Canadian province."

"• Present federal laws will continue to apply in Quebec.

"• Quebec taxpayers will continue to pay their federal taxes.

"• Our currency will still be the Canadian dollar.

"• There will be no national boundaries between Quebec and the other provinces."

The ad goes on to explain how a PQ government would call for a vote of the National Assembly on the principle of independence, negotiate the terms of sovereignty and association with Ottawa and prepare a new constitution to be submitted to a referendum in two years.

In the meantime, it would address itself to four immediate priorities: the repeal of bill 63, the school-language law that is a nationalistic sticking point for many Quebecers; a winter-works program to mitigate winter unemployment; higher family allowances; and action against inflation. Of these, only the first-named is even remotely related to the nationalism that was supposed to be the PQ's driving force.

The fuzziness of the independence question was not directed as a sop toward frightened English voters, but was a recognition that there were many French-speaking voters who would be happier about voting PQ if they didn't have to make up their minds on independence right away.

"Some consider it necessary," wrote Le Devoir editorialist Laurent Laplante two days before the election (each of the paper's four editorial writers was given a chance to express his own opinion: two came out for the Liberals, two for the PQ), "to situate independence at the very heart of the current electoral debate. This vision of things has the advantage of clarity. In voting for the Parti Québécois, the elector would cast a fully lucid vote in favour of independence. Conversely, for anyone who does not wish independence, it would become impossible to support the Parti Québécois."

"For my part, I refuse to participate at this point in a hardening of positions of this sort. I will vote in favour of the Parti Québécois even though I still entertain certain doubts about independence. Why? To signify my support for the only political grouping which seems to me to be respecting the minimum rules of democratic life."

Significantly, Lévesque himself said in Chicoutimi in the last week of the campaign that he was convinced that the PQ would win the election easily if it didn't have to "be the vehicle for that which we believe to be a necessity for Quebec, that is independence."

He elaborated: "If we were not condemned — and I think it's a very fruitful condemnation — to be the vehicle for independence I believe the PQ might have been in power since 1970, but it's a sure thing that it would be in power next Monday."

"On every street corner there are people who tell us: 'We regret not being able to be with you because we are afraid. For all the rest, we would with you.'"

Eric Kierans reported that Lévesque himself had been in favour of dropping the independence plank from the platform entirely, but was overruled by the party executive.

It is too early to tell how PQ strategists will interpret the success of the new approach to independence in the light of the election results. But it is clear that there is a growing feeling within the party that while much will have to change in the political and economic relations between Quebec and English Canada, there is more than one option that might be acceptable to a PQ government.

The smug English Canadian conclusion that "separatism is dead" found little to justify it in the election results. PQ strength is too persistent and too widespread to interpret the election as unambiguously a victory for federalism and a defeat for the Parti Québécois. The future of "separatism" as such is, however, in doubt.

In the immediate aftermath of the election, there was a chorus of calls for the PQ to drop the independence plank from its platform entirely. Most of these calls were from highly suspect sources. Premier Bourassa said on election night that "it is possible that the PQ might change its stand for independence in view of its defeat tonight." The next day the Toronto Globe and Mail chimed in that "it is not impossible to imagine a Parti Québécois gradually tempering the arguments of absolute separatism and looking for a more general constituency as a centre-left party...."

Whether such a party would be any more palatable to the Globe and Mail is questionable, and has little to do with whether or not the PQ moves in that direction. But the PQ has left the door to such a possibility open, and it only remains to be seen whether the party will now march through that open door.

Group takes inventory of ravines

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Toronto has often been called an urban wilderness, but some people are more concerned about protecting the few natural environments remaining in the city than with calling it names.

The Toronto Field Naturalists Club (TFNC) is conducting a series of ecological inventories of ravines in Toronto. According to U of T History Professor Jack Cranmer-Byng, a member of the TFNC, these ravines represent some of the only "natural" environments left in the city.

The first of these ecological inventories is a study of the Chatsworth Ravine, which borders Chatsworth Drive, near Yonge and Lawrence. The report suggests that a ravine can be an "island of ecological diversity" in a city such as Toronto.

Other ravine studies are still in the "interest-forming" stage, according to Cranmer-Byng. However, he feels that the TFNC will be able to marshal the necessary resources to study all of them.

Because of the specialized nature of these inventories, experts such as botanists and geographers have to become involved, which tends to slow down the whole process. Cranmer-Byng does not expect the city to come forward with funds to finance the project, which is being done voluntarily by members of the TFNC.

Stewart Hiltz, a member of the TFNC and also a geography student at U of T, suggests that Toronto ravines are simplified (and hence unstable) ecosystems.

Hiltz has found that the ravines tend to harbor more alien plant species than native plants, although he says that no one knows exactly what factors cause this. He also says that the problem is greater to the south of Bloor Street than to the north.

Ravines, according to Hiltz, perform many important functions. For instance, they are an important factor in bird migration. If Toronto's ravines are destroyed, bird migrations which span the whole continent could be affected by leaving the birds no familiar place to go.

Hiltz also suggests that people need to appreciate variety in natural environments. He claims that a choice of environments, including those offered by ravines, is extremely important for people living in urban settings.

Cranmer-Byng and Hiltz feel that ravines are threatened from two sources — property owners, and the city parks department.

The top edges of ravines tend to be privately owned. A homeowner whose property borders a ravine is thus free to cut down the trees, for example which will threaten the ravine with erosion.

Both Cranmer-Byng and Hiltz feel that legislation is needed to protect ravines from the whims of private property owners. They hope that the city planning board will eventually adopt legislation for the protection of ravines, which will allow citizen committees to perform a watchdog role in the preservation of ravines.

The second threat to ravines comes from the city parks department itself. Ravine valleys are public property, and are administered by that department. Cranmer-Byng and Hiltz claim that the city has the wrong image of ravines.

Hiltz accuses the city parks department of wanting to turn every ravine into a lawn, and of neglecting the very nature of ravines.

R. Windsor, of the city planning department, is sensitive to this criticism. He agrees that we "should strive to protect them and not develop them," although he feels that there may be cases when development of a ravine is in the public interest.

Windsor points out that in 1971, the province enacted special legislation to allow the city to protect its ravines. He states further that a consolidated report on ravines is just being completed, and will be brought before the city buildings and development committee shortly.

The planning board held a series of public meetings in the spring before drawing up its policy on ravines.

US group disrupts women's conference

By MARILYN EMERSON

An American-based group called Spartacist created moments of dissonance last weekend at the Ontario Conference on Women.

During Saturday's plenary session at Cody Hall objections were raised when Spartacist members repeatedly took the floor to report on workshops.

A Spartacist member was denied first speaking rights on the workshop "Women in the Workforce" because it was felt by other women present at the workshop that the Spartacist point of view did not reflect the combined efforts of the workshop.

When Spartacist members continued to press their view during a report on "Women in Politics" many women left the auditorium in protest.

At this point Spartacist members raised the issue of a seat on Sunday's panel for discussion on theory, strategy and tactics.

Previously denied a seat on the panel, they now requested a vote on the issue. The motion was passed after little debate.

A spokeswoman for the Spartacists later stated that they were denied a seat on the panel because they were told by the U of T SAC office that "the conference was for Canadian feminists." SAC was a cosponsor of the conference.

Representatives from the Spartacists were from New York, Buffalo and Detroit. They believe there is an important difference between feminism and socialism. They say feminism leads to an alliance with the bourgeoisie whereas socialism leads to an alliance with the working classes. They said they believe the working classes have the social power.

During Sunday's plenary session questions from the floor were raised twice regarding the legality of Spartacist members voting on motions and amendments.

A representative to the workshop "Women in The Workforce" questioned whether an American political organization had the legal right to influence and vote on motions to be addressed to the Ontario Federation of Students. The question was dismissed as "out of order."

At the end of the plenary a Spartacist member requested a vote on a list of resolutions drawn up by her organization. Again the issue of whether or not this was legal was brought up.

A professor from the Faculty of Education demanded a ruling from the chair on the legality of the proposal. Her demand was denied on the grounds that the issue had already been settled.

Because of lack of time the Spartacist resolutions were not presented on the floor. When asked whether the resolutions were drawn up out of the conference, a Spartacist spokeswoman admitted they were drawn up prior to the convention.

Chairwoman of the session on the case for Dr. Morgentaler, Anna Cushman, felt it was the democratic right of the Women's Commission of the Spartacist League to speak freely at the conference. Cushman said she hoped that out of a spirit of unity "concrete proposals of things we can do together" could be arrived at.

Scar Expressway on its way to City Hall

By PAUL Mc GRATH

A proposed new alignment for the Scarborough Expressway (the east extension of the Gardiner Expressway), is on its way to City Hall, and it's a plan that is bound to cause problems for city politicians in the next few months.

The new route, instead of running through the middle-class neighbourhoods of the Coxwell-Woodbine area, will now pave its way through the predominately working-class neighbourhoods of the Riverdale area. The proposal already has the Greater Riverdale Organization hot on the trail of those involved in the decision.

In a report to the Metro transportation committee this week, Metro Planning Board gave qualified support to the proposal, although it warned the committee that it would face a lot of flak from east-end residents on the new alignment.

The planning board warned that the new route will displace people in the Riverdale area who are much less able to afford new housing than those who would have been displaced by the old plan.

The new route is a direct result of Toronto's voting pattern in the last election.

Mayor Crombie promised a new focus in transportation, and one of the first things the Metro Executive did this year was to send the 1967 proposal back to De Leuw Cather, the original consultant, for a new look at the possibilities.

De Leuw Cather decided that the new route, in which the expressway cuts north from the Gardiner between Pape and Broadview Aves. instead of between Coxwell and Woodbine Aves., would result in less displacement of business and residences.

The planning board has expressed a few doubts about De Leuw Cather's decisions. Although the new route drops significantly the number of homes required for expropriation from 1,109 to 502, the planning board said that costs of restoring the community do not appear to have been taken into full consideration.

"Generally speaking, conventional urban renewal provides for the relocation of displaced residents. But the consultant's study report fails to acknowledge the greater mobility of higher income households (which appear to predominate in the 1967 alignment) as compared with the apparently lower income households proposed to be displaced by the old alignment."

"Accordingly," the report states, "the entire social cost of restoring the community does not appear to have been entirely acknowledged in the cost estimates given by the consultants for the expressway extension either for the 1967 proposal or the 1973 revision; but they are, perhaps, no longer capable of being ignored."

The arguments of the planning board do not quite mesh with the consultant's ideas. De Leuw Cather said in a comparison study that the new route would result in "minimal" disruption of neighborhoods, as opposed to the "significant" disruption afforded by the old alignment.

The consultant's report, having gone to the transportation committee, now must be forwarded to the Metropolitan Toronto Transportation Plan Review study group as input to a general review of the city's transportation plan.

The Plan Review group is now required by Metro Executive to hold public meetings on the topic. The first one is to be held today on campus in Room 2158 of the Medical Sciences Building at 2 p.m. The Plan Review group must then take all input, including the results of the public hearings and report back to the executive by February of 1974.

With the Greater Riverdale Organization on one side trying to fully air the problem before hasty decisions are made, Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey is pushing from the other side to have the executive make a final decision on the matter before too long.

In a letter to Metro Executive in August Godfrey stated: "The extension of the F.G. Gardiner Expressway has been talked about, discussed, reviewed and analyzed to the point that in my office, I have files on this subject material at least six inches thick, but the fact remains, we have still not made a decision."

Godfrey added, that although public hearings were desired "at all costs, we should avoid a repetition of the Spadina difficulties."

The Spadina "difficulties" are what Godfrey believes to be a duplication of public hearings that resulted in a waste of time on the proposal.

"If the Council's decision is to eliminate the Expressway, there the matter should end. On the other hand, if the Council's decision is to proceed, then the application to the OMB should be made immediately so that an OMB decision, after following its own processes, can be available to us by the end of April, 1974."

Godfrey, who as Metro Chairman has been pushing the expressway concept for transportation, is intent on avoiding the situation of a half-finished expressway being given a halt decision from the provincial government, as was the case with the Spadina.

Radical can't get landed

PETERBOROUGH (CUP) — Andrew Wernick, a sociology professor at Trent University in Peterborough has not been one of 50,000 illegal immigrants who have been granted official status under the recent Canadian 60 day immigration amnesty.

Indeed, professor Wernick has been conducting a legal fight with the government for over two and a half years in order to obtain a decision. He thinks his difficulties have something to do with his radical activities at U of T in the late sixties.

While at the U of T Wernick participated in several student demonstrations and helped establish the Toronto Student Movement as the New Left Caucus. Wernick was a well-publicized leader of the Canadian student movement during this time.

In March 1971 he married a Canadian woman and applied for landed-immigrant status. He hasn't heard anything since.

Unofficially the word is out that Wernick doesn't meet Canada's immigration requirements. In Ottawa an official in the Immigration Department said that if immigration authorities officially notify Wernick about his inability to become a landed immigrant he may be subject to deportation without appeal — the same penalty which applies to all illegal immigrants who did not come forward during the Government's amnesty period.

Wernick's only recourse, he said, is to take his case directly to Minister of Immigration, Robert Andras.

The 60-day grace period allowed by the federal government ended October 15 was described as "a complete success" by the Immigration department. The relaxed rules applied to immigrants brought somewhere between 49,000 and 50,000 immigrants out of the woodwork.

Unofficial estimates of immigrants still illegally in Canada run anywhere from another 50,000 to 250,000, depending on which government department makes the estimate.

Tales from Vietnam highlight Armstrong trial

By BOB BETTSON

Karleton Armstrong is nearing the end of his two-year ordeal after being captured in Toronto in February 1972, and shipped off to Madison, Wisconsin last April to face murder and arson charges in connection with the August 1970 bombing of the Army Math Research Centre in Madison.

The $100,000 reward made Armstrong the highest-priced fugitive from justice in North American history, ironically for an offence he said he committed to protest what he felt was the worst crime his country had committed.

Armstrong's sentencing will come Friday following final summations of defence and prosecution. The maximum sentence possible under the plea-bargaining will be 25 years. Counting the two years Armstrong has already spent in jail (13 months of it in Toronto's Don Jail awaiting extradition), he could be eligible for parole in five years.

The hearing began October 15 with testimony of veterans of the Vietnam war to document what Armstrong sees as the criminal nature of that conflict itself.

Ronald Carbon, a Madison native and war veteran, told of killing water buffalo to deprive peasants of their most prized possessions next to the land itself. He called the US action "tantamount to being genocidal." He said that "along with thousands and thousands of other vets, with more courage, I would have done what Karl did."

A marine veteran of 17 years, John Naveau of Alameda, California, told of emptying 90 rounds of .45 calibre machine gun fire into a school bus which he thought contained a suicide squad.

"There were 36 children in it and 24 of them were dead. . . I don't like it anymore, I don't like anyone connected with it."

Steve Hawkins, a munitions specialist, told the court about handling four types of weapons developed with the aid of the Madison Army Math Research Centre including counter-insurgency weapons, poison gases, skyrocket, smart bombs and computerized warheads.

He added that the air force drops napalm and cyanide gas together to form hydrogen cyanide "which was used in gas chambers by the Nazis to kill Jews and is what we used against the Indonesians."

Marine pilot Andy Floyd explained the actual bombing procedure: "All you have are mathematical equations. Moral factors are irrelevant. . . it wasn't uncommon to dump all 56 one-ton bombs on a suspected sniper."

He testified that the targets of American pilots were "the entire population," confirming a university study which found that 20,000 of 25,000 North Vietnamese casualties were civilian deaths.

Barton Osborn, a military intelligence agent, told the court about efforts to capture or assassinate suspected National Liberation Front members. Captured Vietnamese were interrogated in a hut that Osborn said "was in fact a torture facility. At no time did I see a detainee survive one interrogation."

This operation, called the Phoenix program, has a new name "F-6", he explained, but it has been updated and expanded. About 42,000 Vietnamese have been killed since the program's inception in the late 50's, Osborn said.

Army veteran William Curman said: "When I volunteered for the draft, I had some idea that the Communists were taking over the world. When I was in Vietnam I started seeing atrocities and a lot of racism. People acted as if the Vietnamese were subhuman in order to kill them without qualms."

A weapons mechanic, Bill Amos, testified on the training in chemical warfare. He described the chemical agents, gases and anti-personnel bombs he loaded as able to "choke, bleed, blister, and cause vomiting."

Dennis Brock, a former Green Beret, told the shocked courtroom about the American policy of rewarding those Americans who cut off the ears of the Vietnamese they killed with "Kill-Cong" badges.

The defense also called psychiatrist Robert J. Lifton who testified that the "numbing" atmosphere of daily atrocities in the Vietnam war inspired the "rage and guilt" that provoked young political activists to violent means of resistance.

Lifton also explained the sense of betrayal experienced by soldiers who began to understand the cruelty and hypocrisy of the Vietnam war.

He recounted a story of a war veteran "about a helicopter pilot who was transporting a shithouse by which he meant a toilet arrangement from one base to another. The helicopter crashed and the pilot died."

Karleton Armstrong (right) will be sentenced this week in connection with Madison Wisconsin bombing.

"And he said, 'He died in all that shit. If I were going to die in Vietnam that's how I would like to die. In shit. That's the only way to die in Vietnam. There's no hero's death in Vietnam.'"

Egbert Pfeiffer, an American Zoology professor and author of a book on chemical warfare in Vietnam and Cambodia told the hushed courtroom of his five trips to Vietnam. He testified that over half of the country side had been hit by defoliation agents and showed slides of decimated forests and croplands.

Pfeiffer said: "I sat back in astonishment as I heard Nixon on April 30, 1970, lie to the American people as he pointed to this village on the Cambodian map and say it was the centre of North Vietnamese troop operations and had been totally controlled by the North Vietnam for five years."

Pfeiffer had visited the village only three months before and had found no evidence of any North Vietnamese activity.

He went on to describe an incident of US bombing in Cambodia where a school clinic and an ambulance con-

There has been a virtual blackout of news of the Armstrong trial according to York history professor Gabriel Kolko who testified at the hearing last week. Kolko is an American expatriate active in the anti-war movement in Toronto.

According to Toronto lawyer Paul Copeland, the two week hearing, which ended Friday, "involved the tightest security he has ever seen. Anyone entering the courtroom has to have two passes and pass through two groups of sheriffs and a metal detector."

voys were hit mistakenly and the US offered to pay reparations of $400 each for 25 innocent victims.

"Now the US government wants to take 25 years of this young man's life for killing one man and the US, who killed 25 Cambodians, paid them each 400 bucks."

He described US policy in North Vietnam as "to systematically destroy anything of permanent value to the Vietnamese south of Hanoi."

Later witnesses, according to Copeland, compared Armstrong's action to the French underground's acts of violence against the Third Reich during World War II.

Other witnesses testified about the history of American involvement in Vietnam and the growth of the anti-war movement in the United States as well as the legal tradition of the individual's right to take action against an "immoral and illegal war."

HEROES RESIDE A CURIOUS RACE OF CREATURES...

Varg dworp snord

Whooppee! Life at the Varg sure is fun? Yes, we are a curious breed. If you are a floobie, a dworp, a dweezle, a snurd, a snord or snat you'll fit in here. Actually, all we're looking for is new staff, preferably of the human genus, although we do have a dog that's been doing wonders on the rewrite staff.

The thing is, it isn't hard to work for the Varsity. Writing a news story isn't difficult and it's good training for writing any sort of essay you have. Saying something in as few words as possible is an art much appreciated by profs in any field.

Any recruit has a chance to get involved in all the different things that go into making this newspaper. Photographers, layout artists, dog-lovers, sports freaks and culture freaks all get their say.

There are a lot of things going on this year at the university, and it's hard to report on it all when we are forced to spread ourselves so thin. Extra staff can make the difference between an incredible and an outstanding newspaper. So you can make the difference. Come on up to the second floor of 91 St. George St. right across from the Robarts mausoleum and say hello.

Sawbones Carve UC and Scar

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Last week Meds lobotomized Scarborough 22-21. The operation was not deemed a medical success until a final thrust gave the doctors a converted touchdown in the dying seconds.

The victor of the game was almost assured of the final playoff spot in the II division.

The medical students got the grave-digging underway when Tim Burns shovelled past several bodies into the endzone for an unconverted TD.

Under a second quarter moon, the white-froked hackers stole down to the Scarborough 10. Dalziel then picked his way by several more bodies into the endzone. Meds still hadn't found any bodies but you had to give them points (12) for trying.

Snow Blurys swept a field-goal through to give Meds a 15-0 lead.

Halfway through the 3rd quarter, the anaesthesia wore off and Scar began to move. Finally, Hudersa rambled from the 17 on a power sweep and Scar only trailed 15-7.

Med's opening cuts no longer seemed so incisive as Pupili took Scar 54 yards on 2 passes and supplied them with a life-giving TD.

Down only 15-14 and gaining momentum, Scar began to dominate completely. They recovered a Meds fumble and ripped 62 yards in seven plays. Eisen followed his bloody nose into the endzone from the 2 and the jubilant Scar mob, now leading 21-15, planned a post-game lynching of the apprehended grave-robbers.

In what turned out to be the decisive play, Scar unsuccessfully faked a field-goal with only 2 minutes left, and Meds took over at their 12.

Using the out-of-gounds and time-outs, Meds sliced carefully through the defence to the Scar 44. With 35 seconds, Saffrey took a screen to the 20. On the next play, Seppala (know affectionately to his mother as 'Mad Dog') had a wobbly thrown pass drop through a crowd and land accidentally in his arms while he was lying flat on his back at the 2.

Then QB Bradley went around the end on a keeper to tie it at 21 even. On the second last play of the game, a frenzied crowd watched Meds kick their first convert of the game to snatch the victory.

A cadaver was raffled off at half-time with the proceeds going towards the construction of a new morgue in the Faculty Club.

Some feel games played in the rain can be dismissed as flukes one way or the other. The players themselves realize in interfacuity play that it is part of the game and place great stock in soggy victories. Yesterday Meds beat UC.

The score is irrelevant. There was a surprising paucity of miscues, considering the weather and the fact the ball was a retreat. Those there were went both ways.

The tide swung back and forth and the difference was which team saw the other's weaknesses and best utilized their own capabilities. UC started strong in this department. Their shotgun offence caught Meds off-guard as did Lorne Young's quick kicks and Dave Pandey's sprint-out catches. UC struck first; their good QB Dave Ross sweeping right with superb moves considering the footing.

When Med's threatened, UC held them on a third and one situation. Later UC faked a third down attempt from their own 25 yard line (which Med's unaccountably fell for). They kicked instead and Med's were fortunate to recover.

The second and third quarters featured occasional interludes from Med captain Bill Dalziel. He delivered his usual number of dramatic soliloquies to the referees while each team huddled together for warmth. If he practices medicine the way he plays football, he'll have a malpractice suit on his hands for stitching his foot into a patient's mouth.

The fourth quarter saw the tide turn. Med's finally realized if they stayed away from Pandey and Young they could run wide at will. As the lights came up for the first time this year Tim Burns and Ed Russell ran behind adequate blocking for two touchdowns. "The Nose" blew the first convert but was successful on the second.

Ah! There's just something about playing football in the rain. Maybe it's the feeling you get lying in a muddy pool with water dripping down your nose into your mouth and watching a young lady tentatively edge around a puddle.

Out of eight games that had been scheduled for playing since Monday October 22, only 3 have actually been played while the other five were won or lost by a team defaulting. The new schedule had a very promising start with two eager Engineering teams meeting each other in the first game. The Eng. I's won quite decisively with a score of 20-4 over Eng. II.

McChesney was high scorer for Eng. I with two tries. McAlpine and Maddever each scored one try while Thompson made good on two out of 4 conversions. Webster scored the only try for Eng. II which was unconverted. It was quite surprising that the style of play of both teams was so different since they both benefit from competent coaching from Martin Reader.

The other game on Monday, October 22, between Trin. A and Law was defaulted by Law.

On Tuesday, October 23, the Jocks defeated Trin B by a score of 6-0. Cooling scored for PHE with Sullivan converting. Wednesday and Thursday saw Vic default to Eng. I and Law respectively. Trin. B dropped out of the league so their game scheduled against Trin. A didn't come off. (Rumour has it the Trin boys would have ended up playing with themselves.)

The only other game played to date was between PHE I and Eng. II. The Jock's "Cooly" handled the plumbers with Cooling scoring eight of the sixteen points for the Jocks. Rumble finally managed to stay within the lines and score four with Ken "the Toe" Sullivan converting one of the tries. PHE are now playing a much better and more stylish game thanks to their new coach who is very skilled, experienced and devoted to the game.

For anyone who is counting, the fifth default was on Monday 29 with the lawyers pleading the fifth and defaulting to the jocks.

Ms win in field hockey

By DAINA ZUKAUSKAS

Friday saw the beginning of OWIAA league play in field hockey, with Toronto pitted against York. The game was wide open and swing, with both defensive ends seeing a lot of action. Pam Dunbar, right wing, capitalized on a deflection off the York goalkeeper's pads to pop in a well-earned goal. The half ended without York having scored.

In the second half, Blues started strongly and were immediately given a penalty corner. Left inner, Jennifer Dakin, stopped the corner hit and drove it into the net. Blues were ahead in their vendetta, 2-0. (Recall they lost to York 2 weeks ago in the York Earlybird tournament).

The next goal was also by Dakin on a solo break down the pitch. Blues shut out York, 3-0.

The versatile Blues played an excellent game Saturday morning against Queen's. Toronto's first goal came on a penalty corner, as Halpern drove the ball cleanly into the net. A few minutes later, Halpern passed off the Dyannah Prentice (centre forward) who drove in another goal. The halftime horn sounded with Blues ahead, 2-0.

The second half began just as fast. Prentice quickly got a breakaway and dodged past the goalkeeper for her second goal, Toronto's third. Soon after, Queen's rallied with a successful play, giving them their only goal of the game.

Thereafter the game belonged to the Blues. A rush on Queen's net drew the goalie out to clear a shot by Prentice. Dunbar (LI) picked up the deflection and pushed in goal number four. Toronto defence picked up the play after the bully and kept feeding the ball to their forwards. A shot from the circle netted Prentice a hat-trick and Toronto a 5-1 win.

That afternoon Blues bullied off against the host team, McMaster, again taking and maintaining the upper hand. The first goal came on a long drive by Sally Dakin (RW), followed by a tip-in on a rush by Dunbar. The third goal came in the second half. A shot by Halpern was deflected by Mac's defence into their own goal, bringing the score to 3-0.

Mac managed to net only one goal midway in the second half. Dakin drove the ball into the goal again for Toronto, making it a decisive 4-1 conquest.

Toronto's three wins in Part I give them 6 points, and first place in that group. Toronto stands an excellent chance of retaining the field hockey title for yet another year.

In Division I Volleyball action, Vic I repeated their performance of last week, winning two games in a row, this time over PHE. Knox recorded its first win of the season, taking two games from Eng. II, while Music defaulted to Eng. I in the closest match of the week. Erin I edged Meds 16-14 and 15-13.

In Division II, Erin II recorded their second consecutive win by defeating Vic II. Pharm A once again managed a comeback winning the second and third games against New. In other action, it was Grad A over Zman, and For B over Dent B. Innis and Eng III had easy victories, winning by default over Vic II and Wycliffe, respectively.

Early results would seem to indicate that Vic I, Erin I and Scar are the teams to watch.

Med's captured the championship of the Interfacuity field hockey league, defeating Erindale Pharmacy. Penalties against the regular season leaders gave Med's several corners and they took full advantage of them. In the final standings, Erindale Pharmacy finished first with 11 points, a scanty step ahead of Med's with 10. Trinity finished the course with 9, PHE I followed with 5 while New languished in last with 3 points. PHE II and Vic defaulted.

In Division I Soccer, Vic sets a fancy pace, followed closely by Erindale who should eventually give everyone their golden boot. Sr. Eng. and SMC delicately occupy the last two playoff spots.

In Division II, Med's leads the bloodletting. Pharmacy dispenses patent medicines from second, followed by Jr. Eng. Trin A could creep into fourth unless New upsets Jr. Eng. and three poodles tear the Shiek to shreds.

In the dungeons of Division III, dare we disclose that Pharmacy, Eng. III, Grads, and Trin B have found playoff spots? Yes - the Varsity bares all... and remember, you read it here first.

SAC will ask for committee on staffing

SAC's Kanowitch is seen praying for parity while squinty Bob Anderson holds sparse meeting.

By MARILYN EMERSON
SAC will demand from the academic affairs committee that the university form a new committee with equal student representation to decide the issue of student parity on hiring, staffing and tenure committees by next January.

A SAC-sponsored general meeting yesterday passed a resolution telling SAC to take the demand to Tuesday's academic affairs meeting when the committee is scheduled to take up the Forster task force report released last August.

Academic affairs is a committee of the university's governing council in which students form a minority. The Forster report — already on the committee's agenda for consideration — recommends no student participation in hiring, firing, staffing or tenure decision.

Last month's referendum on student participation in staffing decisions showed a majority in favour of parity — equal student — faculty representation on tenure and appointments committees.

Claiming SAC "has a mandate to proceed" SAC president Bob Anderson has stated a parity committee such as the meeting endorsed is how he wishes the issue to be resolved.

Prior to yesterday's meeting SAC executive assistant Art Moses said the purpose of the meeting was to assess student support and discuss strategy.

The meeting opened with a discussion on student involvement, and all agreed that students do not fully understand the issues under attack.

SAC representatives urged immediate action be taken to make clear to the student body just what is at stake.

Compiling of more information, better circulation of material, mass meetings and debates were suggested toward achieving this aim.

One embittered participant remarked: "Students are more interested in a circus than in a serious discussion on university affairs."

While hundreds of students heckled an Arab protest rally in the foyer of Syd Smith only a few found their way around the corner 30-feet away to SAC's staffing meeting.

It was further suggested that university president Dr. John Evans call a "rap session" between SAC and faculty.

Anderson moved for a parity body contending that an academic body such as governing council would be an "illegitimate one to discuss strategy."

When a proposal was made that the Forster Report be "rejected," Anderson stated: "SAC doesn't want academics to reject the Forster report."

The academic affairs meeting is to be held at 4 pm in the board room of Simcoe Hall.

SAC will demand that "the university strike a parity committee to report by January on means of selecting students for staffing committees. The students must be appointed by the representative student organizations," according to the resolution passed yesterday.

Province announces new minimum wage

By BOB BETTSON

Ontario Labor Minister Fern Guindon announced yesterday the minimum wage for students under 18 will be increased to $1.65 from $1.45 and that the general minimum wage will be increased to $2.00 from $1.80.

The increases will be effective January 1, 1974. Guindon told the house that greater increases are not possible. He said that there is "a danger of creating unemployment by setting an unrealistically high minimum wage."

Students working at summer resorts will also benefit from the increases. Not more than $25.00 a week can be taken off for room and board from the $2.00 minimum wage.

The learner rate which is often paid to students in the first month of the job will also go up to $1.90 from $1.70.

The increases parallel a similar increase to $2.00 an hour in Quebec but fall behind the increase to $2.50 in British Columbia starting next year.

Guindon has previously stated that the earlier minimum wage increase this year cost more than a thousand jobs, mostly for students over 18.

Guindon also claimed that "textile, tourist and service industries cannot absorb greater cost increases and still remain competitive."

The announcement was greeted with little enthusiasm by the Liberals and New Democrats who said that the increases were long overdue. Liberal leader Bob Nixon asked Guindon if this would make the minimum wage greater than welfare payments.

Guindon said that there was a slightly higher payment with the new minimum wage.

New Democratic Party leader Stephen Lewis criticized the Conservative government for not providing protections to workers affected by plant shutdowns.

Another increase announced was for construction employees to $2.25 from $2.05. Guindon also said that the present four statutory holidays with pay will be increased to seven in 1975, adding New Year's Day, Victoria Day, and Thanksgiving Day.

Starting in 1975 time-and-a-half will be paid for overtime in excess of 44 hours per week instead of the present 48 hours.

Employees will also be eligible for two weeks annual vacation with pay after one year instead of one week vacation with pay after a year.

Guindon said the increases in statutory holidays with pay are to prevent employees in low wage industries from being forced to take a holiday and lose a day's wages.

Among those exempted from the act are farm-workers, commission salesmen and students working for charitable-group-operated camps, as well as student nurses.

Vacation pay will also be increased from two per cent to four per cent for the first year of employment.

GAA starts phone campaign to recruit 200 more votes

By DAVID LIPTON

At a meeting held on Tuesday night the Graduate Assistant Association (GAA) prepared the final phase of its campaign to unionise the U of T's teaching assistants.

To receive union certification by the Ontario Labour Relations Board the GAA must have enrolled at least one third of the approximately 2,100 graduate assistants at the U of T. At the time of the meeting the FAA had around 500 members. It is still 200 short of its goal.

The members present at Tuesday's meeting resolutely moved forward to enroll the necessary number of new members by 1 December. Accordingly, a motion was unanimously adopted to establish an organising committee to coordinate the final unionising drive.

A combination of graduate apathy and anti-union inclinations of many members of the graduate community is the principal obstacle to the GAA's drive for union certification.

To counteract this obstacle, lists of names of people who had not already joined the union were distributed to those members present at the meeting. In the next two weeks a concerted telephone campaign will carry the GAA's unionising efforts into the homes of the non-unionised graduate assistants.

The telephone campaign tops a month-long drive to push the fledgling organization over the top. In the first ten days of registration last month, the association signed up over half of the required number of grad assistants. Response for the GAA's efforts has been best from Engineering, where the salary levels are the lowest on campus. A grad assistant in Engineering averages about $900 a year, while assistants in Humanities and Social Sciences average between $1,250 and $1,800 a year.

Even without certification, the association has gone to bat on a number of issues, including back vacation pay owed, and is trying to set a more equitable time formula for actual work provided. Presently assistants are paid on time spent in the classroom and not for preparation. TA's provide 40 per cent of the undergraduate teaching on the campus, and are per capita the lowest-paid group.

U of T fund-raiser hindered Chilean economy

By BOB GAUTHIER

The inner sanctums of the university administration contain a quiet group of people called the Private Support Group whose job, on the surface, is to advise on university fundraising.

One member of the university body is not only an executive of Noranda Mines Ltd., but a member of the Export Development Corporation (EDC), which denied federal government money to the government of Chile's late president, Salvador Allende.

A.H. Zimmermann is comptroller and a vice president of Noranda Mines Ltd., which only received $4.1 million back from the Allende government of its original $4.5 million investment in its Chilean subsidiary, Chile Canadian Mines, after the nationalization of the firm by Allende.

The EDC, Canada's counterpart to the American Export-Import Bank, refused to extend credits to Chile's Allende government.

The EDC provides loans and credits to foreign buyers of Canadian goods and services and insures financing granted by private banks to foreign customers.

From August 1961 to August 1970, the total financing agreements signed by Chile with the EDC amounted to $24.7 million. After Allende's elections, there was no EDC financing granted to Chile.

In a June, 1973, memorandum from U of T president John Evans, Zimmermann was appointed one of 16 members of the university's money raising board.

The memorandum states that the board "shall be established to provide guidance on policy for fund raising activities by the University of Toronto with the purpose of maximizing the level of support which the University might derive from the private sector."

The board must, however, report any policy recommendations to the Governing Council through External Affairs Committee. The board is also responsible for evaluating all proposals for financial support from the corporate sector which originate within the university.

The board consists of 16 members with Evans as chairman; eight members are drawn from the corporate and private sectors (some present members from the Governing Council), and eight selected "from among the university staff to reflect the interests and needs of the various divisions of the university".

There is no provision for student or alumni constituency representation.

In a final note Evans' memorandum reveals that "members will be expected to contribute to the development of policy on fund raising and the review of specific projects in terms of suitability, priority and mechanism of implementation," although members are supposed to keep a low — visibility profile and "are not expected to become directly involved in the process of fund raising."

Other support board members from the private sector include Governing Council members Betty Kennedy, W.O. Twaits, Imperial Oil Limited chairman and chief executive officer W.J.D. Lewis, Prudential Insurance Company of America, and R.E. Harrison of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

Faculty members include Scarborough Principal Ralph Campbell, Political Economy chairman Steve Dupré, and School of Graduate Studies Dean Ed Safarian. Kieth Hendrick, Noranda Sales Corporation president, and one of the 16 provincial Conservative government's appointees to the Governing Council, was not placed on the board with corporate partner Zimmermann.

Zimmermann is also on the boards of a number of Noranda subsidiaries as well as some other Canadian companies.

Pagan still fights extradition

Early next week a new date to hear the appeal of Humberto Pagan Hernandez will be set as he continues his fight against extradition to the United States on a murder charge stemming from a Puerto Rican student demonstration.

In a 6-3 ruling handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada on Monday, the high court overturned an earlier decision by the Federal Court of Appeals which had ruled that it had no jurisdiction in the case.

The Supreme Court ruled the Federal Court does in fact have jurisdiction to review the original decision of no extradition made by County Court Judge A.E. Honeywell who ruled there was no credible evidence that Pagan had murdered the commander of the San Juan riot squad during a March 1971 fracas between police and student supporters of the Puerto Rican independence movement.

It appears the Pagan case could drag on again for some length. Clayton Ruby, Pagan's lawyer, said the Federal Court must now review the county court transcript and decide if there is basis for extradition.

If the ruling from the federal court is against Pagan — although Ruby would not make any predictions which way that court might rule — the case could be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada again.

Monday's ruling from the Supreme Court was on a legal technicality and did not deal with the substantive issue in the extradition case: did or did not the US government present a prima facie case on the charge of murder?

That issue now goes to the federal court for a ruling.

Should Pagan win the extradition hearing, he still would face deportation proceedings under the immigration act, but these proceedings have been set aside until the completion of extradition.

Opposition MP's charge Canada to blame in Chile

OTTAWA (CUP) Canada did not help bring about the economic collapse that led to the recent military coup in Chile, External Affairs minister Mitchell Sharp claimed in a statement outside of the House October 26.

However, some opposition MP's disagree with his contention.

In Chile, some American companies and banks initiated an international credit boycott of Chile. This boycott created severe economic problems in Chile and is part of the reason the military was able to gain power.

Sharp commented that "throughout the period of the Allende government, Canada's commercial and economic relations with Chile were maintained at previous levels, and in some areas, were even increased." He said that the government-owned Export Development Corporation (EDC) last April approved a loan of five million dollars for the purchase of aircraft and telecommunications equipment by Chile.

But NDP MP John Harney insisted that Sharp was "trying to obscure the fact that the EDC put credits to Chile under review."

In the House of Commons last week, Harney said, "the international community turned on Chile and we went along with them. We put our credit to Chile under review. That is to say, we forwarded no new credits and Chile absolutely needed those to survive. It is not good enough to say that we did not do anything; it was the very fact that we did not do anything which hurt the economy of Chile."

An examination of the facts Sharp used to support his statement confirmed Harney's suspicion that the government is trying to mystify the matter rather than clear it up.

EDC officials said the five million loan Sharp mentioned was never signed.

During the sixties, however, the EDC had granted $24.6 million in loans and credits to Chile.

Sharp also maintained that between 1970 and the end of 1973, Canada will have financed two projects costing over five million dollars through the Inter-American Development Bank (IADB). He did not reveal that this money was committed in 1967, long before Allende's election, nor that IADB was one of the initiators of the economic boycott of the Allende government.

Heath McQuarrie, a Conservative MP and a member of that party's external affairs committee, said, outside the House, that he has never been satisfied with the government's explanations of Canada's role in the economic boycott of Chile. He said he is convinced the EDC "was making it difficult for the Allende government."

McQuarrie complained about the difficulty of getting the facts of the situation. "Any information available is in the hands of the government or government agencies and they can choose what is in their best interest to release," he said.

Provincial plant action called "a fiasco" by NDP's Lewis

By BOB BETTSON

The Ontario government is coming under increasing fire for refusing to take further action to close down the Canada Metals lead smelter on Eastern Avenue.

Premier William Davis told the house yesterday that the province would not agree to co-operate with the city council to relocate the plants without "careful deliberation."

The ministry of environment's stop order on the east-end plant was quashed Tuesday by the Ontario Supreme Court after the company appealed on the grounds that the medical evidence was insufficient.

The original stop-work order was issued after blood tests showed that three of the Riverdale area residents had high lead levels. The three were admitted to hospital.

Environment minister James Auld told the house that criticism of his ministry's handling of the supreme court hearing was unwarranted.

Though he admitted the government had expert witnesses available to testify, Auld claimed that Dr. Henrietta Sachs had appeared as an expert witness on behalf of the companies and "no amount of medical evidence called by us could have changed the factual situation."

However two area mothers have claimed that their children have symptoms of lead poisoning as described by expert Dr. David Parkinson of the Hospital for Sick Children.

The two children have gone to the hospital for further tests. The symptoms are high fever and vomiting.

Edith Linton, an area resident, charged that the workers at the plant are not aware of the dangers they face. "If there is nothing hazardous to your health as they claim, why do they wear masks?" she asked. "Why do they have to have urine tests blood tests and regular medical check-ups?"

Workers at the plant are often laid off for a few weeks with pay if they have high lead levels. They are predominantly immigrants.

Auld told the house that of the three high blood level readings, one was for an employee of a battery plant who could have received his contamination at work and one was from a 20 month old child who could have received the contamination from eating paint particles.

"That leaves one 12 year old girl with a reading of 76 micrograms out of a total sampling of 732 tests," he concluded.

Auld said that the judge's decision was made on the basis that the company had operated in the area for 45 years and since there were only three high lead levels out of 732 tests taken the plant did not constitute an immediate danger to the health of area residents.

The government is now going to make further investigations on the plant's operations but Auld said that this would take four to six weeks.

Auld blamed the delay in lead emission control devices on the city's refusal to grant Canada Metals a building permit. Canada Metals claims that they have the equipment and are waiting to proceed on installing the pollution controls.

However the opposition put the minister under sustained attack for the government's actions in the case.

Liberal leader Bob Nixon asked "are we to believe that the stop order was an error, that the plant is not a danger?"

Auld replied that the government had acted "too rapidly. We have learned a lesson. We need to make exhaustive studies of people and their home environment."

He claimed that many other sources could have caused the high lead levels. However Nixon charged that the companies' witness, Sachs "has paint chips as one of her hobby horses." He said that the government should have been able to support their case with help from the health ministry.

New Democratic Party Leader Stephen Lewis termed the environment ministry's conduct "incompetent." He called for a public enquiry into the air management branch and the redrafting of legislation on stop-work orders. "The air management branch has not been able to manage this company for the past four years," he said.

Auld defended the ministry's record in glowing terms claiming the government had cut pollution in half in Toronto. "There is nothing wrong with the legislation. We are 50 years ahead of anyone else." He called his department's record "magnificent."

Lewis retorted by questioning how the government could call this "fiasco" magnificent, while the plant continues to pollute.

A government working group of health officials, engineers, lawyers and scientists is carrying out further investigations into the causes of the high lead levels.

Though Auld maintains that another order will be issued if the evidence warrants the plant has resumed full production and the pollution continues.

Med school trying for grading system

The faculty of the School of Medicine is trying to bring back the grading system even though the school has been on what is almost a pass-fail marking system for some years.

The medical faculty council in a meeting earlier this week considered a proposal which would have brought back formal grades at the choice of the students, but the matter was not voted on and was deferred to a meeting Monday afternoon.

A move by the student's Medical Society went down to defeat, a proposal which would have eliminated the last vestiges of grades and brought in a simple pass-fail system with a written assessment of the student performance.

The current system of grading in the medical school consists of a certain number of students at the top receiving honors and the rest getting pass or fail, the HPF system.

Grades are not released to either intern or residence committees. All that is listed is Honor, Pass or Fail.

The council, after defeating the student move to abolish Honor, went on to pass a resolution calling for a "numerical or other quantifiable rating" to be made by medical school board of examiners.

The move which will be decided on by the faculty-dominated council Monday calls for the grades to be available to the student on request by the student.

However, medical society representatives say this gives the student no choice, as increasingly, institutions are demanding to see grades, and that a student who chooses only to reveal the HPF system would be discriminated against for failure to state his actual marks.

The current HPF system dates back at least five years when the only grading and rank system was abolished Under that system not only were students graded and the marks available, but students were placed in the rank of standing in their class.

During the intervening years, medical students have repeatedly voted in referendums in favor of the pass-fail system, not of the ballots being in excess of 80 per cent in favor of the pass-fail system.

The move by the U of T medical faculty to bring back grades is in sharp contrast to the current system at McMaster's medical school, where grading is almost a thing of the past.

University president, Dr. John Evans, was at McMaster during the period of time McMaster liberalized its medical programme. There is no indication he has participated in the current moves by the U of T medical faculty.

News of great import

Friday, again and we have to fool around with the layout, juggle a story, crop a picture to find a little space on the page and tell you something of great importance (if I can remember what it was.) Let's see, picked up the laundry, inflated my shoes, kissed the dog, what the hell was it? Oh well, did you hear the one about Dr. John Evans and the pumpkin? Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey is getting a brand-new shiny Cadillac, courtesy of Metro Toronto's taxpayers.

Metro council endorsed a Metro executive recommendation yesterday approving the purchase of a 1974 Cadillac for Godfrey for a sum of $8,127. The purchase is to replace the Metro chairman's 1969 Cadillac.

The actual price of the new car is $10,027, but City Buick Pontiac GMC Ltd., is giving Metro $1,900 on the trade-in.

Godfrey's annual salary as Metro's chief executive officer is in excess of $30,000. The average family income for a typical Metro family is about $7,200, almost $1,00 less than Godfrey's new Cadillac.

Godfrey also led the forces in Monday's Metro transportation committee meeting which shelved the idea of reduced student fares for full-time university students because no one knows how much it will cost the taxpayer.

The TTC's new dial-a-bus for speedier commuter service covers

Godfrey's home in North York and he tried it out the other day finding it only took about 10 minutes longer for him to get to work than driving.

But he said he still plans on using his chauffeured limousine to go to city hall because he like to read reports undisturbed and often has to make stops on the way to work.

Godfrey has also been a long-time supporter of the controversial Scarborough expressway claiming it is necessary to bring cars into the city's downtown areas.

Hey, they're right—the ink does come off in your hands. Black-fingered in this issue were Wayne Roberts, Heather Sanguins, TCLPAC, Absolutely Igor, Marilyn Emerson, Robin Thomson, Beilicose Bob Bettson, Lawrence Clarke, Gilda Oren, Don Cruickshank the road runner tonight. Look out Monday morning.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Daisons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Who says that the university has no place in the boardrooms of the nation? The University of Toronto Governing Council and the behind-the-scenes administrators are fast becoming Upper Canada's Family Compact of the twentieth century. As students we have to remove the blinders of detachment which most of us at this campus seem to feel is the situation at the present time.

It's important to remember that the university and its most respected governors have positions in the rest of society that affect us all, and not only through our educational system. The Governing Council comes close to being an incestuous body.

In a short article on page one today we attempt to show how one man, A. H. Zimmermann is connected both to the elite of the University of Toronto and international events. And we shouldn't fool ourselves into thinking that morally and otherwise this really makes no difference one way or other to us. If someone like Zimmermann can practise what he does in the international corporate world, there's no denying that this same sense of warped social values can be put to use in the "Interest of the university."

There's no denying that the same men controlling this university also control other people and aspects of our lives in the broader community beyond the ivory tower walls.

member of U of T's Private Support Board, charged with advising the administration on fund-raising. However, both he and his Governing Council business colleague, Keith Hendrick are connected to the great Canadian imperialist firm, Noranda. On the one hand Zimmermann is a vice-president and comptroller of Noranda Mines Limited (as well as sitting on the boards of a number of other Canadian companies and other Noranda subsidiaries) and on the other hand Keith Hendrick, a government appointee to the Governing Council is the president of Noranda Sales Corporation. Both are also involved in the business of imperialism. Canadian style.

Zimmermann's connections are particularly interesting, since he's also one of the directors of the federal government's crown Export Development Corporation. Similar to the American Export-Import Bank, the EDC provides loans and credits to foreign buyers of Canadian goods and services and insures financing granted by foreign banks to private customers. Ironically U of T support board member Zimmermann was instrumental in ensuring that, after the election that brought the late Salvador Allende to power, no more loans were granted to Chile.

And Zimmermann had quite a bit to gain from his corporate-governmental connections. As vice-president and controller of Noranda Mines Ltd. he had the power through the EDC to effectively help cut off Canadian funds to Chile after the Allende government decided to nationalize Chile Canadian Mines, a Noranda-controlled company. And Zimmermann has even further cause to want to cut Chile off, for Allende's government only paid back $4.1 million of Noranda's original $4.5 million investment.

The U of T corporate connection doesn't stop there. Governing Council member Sydney Hermant has his own racket going through his family-owned firm, Imperial Optical. Holding a Canadian monopoly east of the Manitoba border on the manufacture of eye glasses and frames, Hermant's company's tentacles reach right down into the heart of the Caribbean, where Imperial has almost a commonwealth preference on the sale of specs.

What about the top dog at U of T, president Dr. John Evans, skiing partner to Ontario's premier Bill Davis. That's the same Bill Davis that, after some consideration of the situation last week, decided to allow a trade mission to wing off to South Africa, where more Canadian companies are hard at work exploiting the indigenous peoples. And what's to be found in South Africa? Well Falconbridge Nickel Mines and International Nickel Company, both folks from Sudbury, Ontario, have developments. Falconbridge is into South West Africa, with the South Africa Development Corporation as a 25 per cent partner. And Falconbridge is also into that supposedly United Nations opposed country Zimbabwe (Rhodesia), where the starting pay for Africans is 56 cents per day for a six day week.

Even Zimmermann's and Hendrick's multinational, Noranda, is into southern Africa in a big way. So again we're back at square one of a confusing maze

The rather macabre humour of the whole situation is that Canada is, at best, a second-rate Imperialist power, satisfied to take the crumbs left over on the United States table. In South Africa, for example, the Davis mission shouldn't expect much; the United States and Britain accounted for 21 and 17 per cent of South Africa's imports last year respectively, while Canada amounted to a paltry one per cent. At least it's nice to know that we're incompetent imperialists, which isn't to say that the amount we do trade we treat anyone better. It's dog eat dog on the Imperialist circuit.

So for those who attend the Chile solidarity march on Sunday afternoon starting from Allan Gardens, or those who go to Sunday evening's mass meeting sponsored by the Committee for an Independent Chile at Convocation Hall, remember that the university and those people running it aren't divorced from the situation. They're affecting us every day in every way through the university bureaucracy and the value system they seek to legitimize at this university. John Evans is a very nice man personally, but . . .

As citizens of Ontario and Canada we cannot afford to ignore the Canadian government's foreign policies which serve certain Canadian business interests for the most part, at the expense of foreign peoples. Life does in fact go on outside the university walls much the same as inside through power relationships and manipulation. Hopefully some students will choose to deal with that perception. An Ontario government civil servant recently unabashedly admitted that the ministry of Industry and Tourism was "the bucks ministry"; one could also call the U of T administration at Simcoe Hall "the bucks administration."

Think twice before you sip your next cup

A coffee-company plugging their product uses the jungle: "Let's have another cup of coffee..."

What that company (Nestle's) does not tell in its catchy tune is that their coffee comes from Angola, where black coffee workers are forced to tend the crops under armed guard behind barbed wire for $7.50 per month.

Canadians make up the second largest coffee-klatch in the world drinking more of the stuff than any other country except the US.

That economic fact has led to the start of a full-scale boycott organized against Angolan coffee imported by three major multi-national firms: Standard Brands, General Foods and Nestle's.

In 1972, Canada imported 23 million pounds of coffee valued at more than $9.7 million, ranking second in imports of Angolan coffee in the world.

Standard Brands and General Foods are American-owned, while Nestle's is owned by Swiss interests.

The Canadian government, however, has not been so equivocal. While voting for a United Nations resolution calling on all states to "withhold from Portugal any assistance which enables it to prosecute the colonial wars in Angola, Mozambique and Guinea (Bissau)," Canada also belongs to the International Coffee Organization — as does Portugal — and allows the Portuguese Angolan coffee to be imported.

Most European nations gave up their African colonies 10 to 15 years ago, opting for a new colonial relationship which enables them to continue to siphon off the wealth produced by the new "independent" African states.

However, the Portuguese, historically, have been behind the times. They were not as sophisticated as their British and French rivals.

They did not abolish the slave trade until forced to do so in the 1870s by the exigencies of the new modes of production brought on by the industrial revolution in the more capitalist states.

When the time came for the western European states to divest themselves of their colonial possessions, the Portuguese refused, steadfastly maintaining that Angola, Mozambique and Guinea-Bissau were not colonies but "overseas provinces".

It is as a result of this stance that revolutionary warfare is now being carried out in Portugal's African colonies.

It was no coincidence that the war in Angola, led by the Movimento Popular de Libertacao de Angola (MPLA) started in 1961.

That year marked the end of a six-year period in which the number of European coffee plantations in Angola rose from 600 to 2,000. Of these plantations, 75 per cent are larger than 250 acres and 43 per cent are larger than 750 acres.

The land involved in this occupation by European colonists was taken from the Africans who had lived on it for centuries, as has been the case with colonial expansion for years.

While the Portuguese were attempting to turn Angola into a settled colony, other such colonies in Africa — such as Kenya, Algeria, and Rhodesia — were undergoing a period of nationalist agitation and armed activity aimed at expelling the European settlers.

As a result of the increase in the amount of land used for coffee production on Portuguese-held plantations, Africans who had been dispossessed were forced either to flee to neighbouring African states or to stay and work on the plantations.

The first choice taken by an estimated 500,000 people, placed an additional burden on the governments of Zaire, Tanzania, Malawi and Zambia which have been forced to provide for the refugees.

This has been detrimental to the development plans of states which already face the difficult task of sustaining their own populations.

Alternatively, there was the choice faced by the Africans who stayed in Angola, the "choice" having been written into the laws which govern Portugal's African colonies.

According to law every native of Angola has the legal and moral duty to work and show the results of that work. Since most Africans live on and from the land it is up to them to prove to the Portuguese authorities that they are in fact engaged in production.

If they cannot do this, they are forced to look for work and if they cannot find work, the regime will secure employment for them working on the coffee plantations.

By this method the Portuguese are able to deliver unwilling workers to the plantations. There exists a large pool of such workers, made up largely of people who had their land stolen when the plantations were set up.

In this way an indirect system of forced labor has become instituted. Although Portugal officially denies the existence of forced labor and calls all workers "volunteers," the truth of the matter is illustrated by the statement of a Portuguese official that "only the dead are exempt from forced labor."

It has been calculated that 10 per cent of the income from the coffee trade is spent directly for military purposes.

The Portuguese government receives 30 per cent of the revenues from the export of Angolan coffee. About a third of that, or 10 per cent of the colonial budget of Angola, is spent on the military, which acts to repress the liberation movement.

Since Portugal collects taxes from European plantation owners and Portugal spends more than half of its national budget on the military, the coffee trade supports the war to maintain the Portuguese presence in southern Africa.

The conditions under which Africans work on these plantations are deplorable. A report by the "Institut für Wirtschaftsforschung" in Munich — which deals with agriculture in the Portuguese colonies — reveals that on a typical coffee plantation in northern Angola, the laborers received $7.50 per month and were given three and one-half square yards of living space.

The use of child labor is intensive because it costs the owners only three-eighths as much as the labor of adults. Often there are no regular wages paid to children. Instead they are paid a sort of "tip" at the end of six-months service.

Extreme labor-intensive methods are used with abysmally low wages paid. Wage costs account for 80 to 85 per cent of production costs and workers are forced to work with the most basic of tools.

Coffee plantations in Angola resemble prison camps, and are surrounded by barbed-wire to keep the workers in while preventing attacks by MPLA guerrillas.

Armed overseers supervise the workers in the fields. The areas with much coffee under cultivation are patrolled regularly by the Portuguese army. On one plantation, Fazenda Lufuge, the heads of "unruly" Africans were prominently exhibited as examples to others thinking of rebellion.

In 1969, Dr. Alfonso Mendes, director of the labor institute of Angola, stated in a confidential report:

"At the present time, there are still many obstacles, not only imposed by the civil authorities, but (by) the military and paramilitary as well — all this under the pretext of defense reasons.

"Administrative authorities still intervene with repression against workers at the request of the respective employers.

"We can see and verify recently a similar intervention of the police and the paramilitary authorities. The cases of extreme physical violence are not few. In legal terms this intervention is designated a 'forced labor'...

"This extremely bad example by the officials has been followed by the employers who do not hesitate to inflict physical punishment for any negligence or irregularity of the workers".

Such evidence answers well those who assert that a boycott of Angolan coffee would be detrimental to the livelihoods of Africans working on the production of that coffee.

Surely the workers involved would fare better if they could work for themselves and produce their own coffee as a cash crop. As the situation now stands, it seems that the plantation workers are little better than the slaves of the Portuguese colonists.

Aged, women "stigmatized"

By HEATHER SANGUINS

"Do two stigmas make a deviance?" was the question posed about the aged and women by speaker Judy Posner at Wednesday's night's INX 260 lecture at the Ontario College of Education. She said further, that, in our society, "all such persons are stigmatized in one way or another, however small." Her topic was social attitudes to the aged, especially aged women.

Posner suggested two perspectives with which to focus on the position of women in our society, the first a macro-political-historical focus, the other is a micro-sociological and psychological focus, which the speaker referred to as "everyday psychology". She defined stigma as being a "minor fault" as compared to deviance which is a "very heavy and real" fault. Posner then described aged women as suffering from a "double whammy", i.e. the two stigmas of being both female and old too.

Posner asserted that the "status of the aged" derives from their mythological "association with death". In our "youth cult" society there exists a "basic fear of biological functions": there is a virtual "taboo on death and dying in our society." From this idea the speaker presented an "approach-avoidance" theory for the social attitudes to the aged. The old are "revered because of the link with the ancestors" that they provide, but at the same time they are avoided because of their "relationship with death", i.e. through signs of bodily decay that society relates to mental and moral decay.

Posner stated that "in our society women are clearly judged for their external beauty" and thus the outside is taken to represent what is going on on the inside resulting in the attitude towards aging in women as "symbolically turned ugly on the inside".

She stated that after researching in homes for the aged she found that "socio-economic crises are different in old women than in old men.

"For men it is when they 'lose their jobs' and thus are detached from their former 'occupational status'. However for women the major crisis is when their 'spouse died', that is they lost their link 'with the outside world.'"

Posner deplored that the "aged are treated like women, and they're all treated like children." She supported this by pointing out these similarities: "Women, children and the aged are traditionally not supposed to enjoy sex. All of these groups are disenfranchised" and are not represented within traditional politics, so they now have their own lobbies. This in itself is a deviance from the regularly recognized political channels."

"We talk babytalk to old people and to children, and there is a tendency to talk to women that way, such as 'now dear, you do this this way.'" Posner said all three groups are "non-people" and have "derived status"; women from their husbands, old people from their children and children from their parents.

Society's "assumption is that all three groups are mentally incompetent."

In research literature and in practice she said, the aged are "referred to all the time as being childish or as being in their 'second childhood'". Women, children and the aged are thought to be "unpredictable" and as not being "socialized properly."

Metro wants to review rent hikes

By ROBIN THOMPSON

Metro council has finally made a decision about a problem older than the council itself: who will act as referee in a landlord-tenant dispute.

Council wants the Landlord-Tenant Advisory Bureau to put on the striped shirt, and also will be setting about to ask the province for the authority to review excessive rent increases and to license landlords.

With a 22-9 vote, council moved in a number of directions based on a report from its legislation committee.

First, the Landlord-Tenant Act should be altered to establish landlord-tenant courts in each community and to hear out any discrepancies, council recommended.

Each residential lease should contain a lease form with rights and responsibilities of both landlord and tenant. According to the committee, anything in the lease which does not meet these rights and responsibilities should be declared illegal.

Another important recommendation was that tenants should be guaranteed freedom of association without the use of tenants' unions, meaning, in other words, no tenant striking allowed.

Concerning rent control, the committee recommended the government should examine residential rental markets, rent scales, construction impediments and means of assuring reasonable cost rental housing.

The main issue introduced was the concept of licensing landlords, or anyone who wants to rent housing to the general public.

The last recommendation was that council should request the provincial government to increase the supply of housing and to provide financial assistance to those who need it for their accommodation.

Metro has had the landlord-tenant advisory bureau since May, 1970. The bureau functions are investigatory, "mediatory, and advisory. It does not, however, have the power to enforce a decision it may make in a dispute.

Last year the bureau dealt with more than 47,000 inquiries and 1,500 complaints. The council recommendation would make bureau decisions binding, if the province agrees.

Metro council and its committees have been passing the issue around for at least six months.

Last May, the legislation committee received a hard-hitting brief from the Metro Labor Council urging council to take action on rent control and tenants rights. Numerous other unions and tenants organizations followed suit in the ensuing months.

Even the front organization for the development corporations, the Urban Development Institute, got in the act by urging "an independent study be carried out to clear the air, once and for all, on the subject of rent controlling legislation".

The labor council, however, was more direct, and after denouncing the situation where "tenants are gouged without conscience by unscrupulous landlords", the council called for rent controls and provincial legislation allowing Metro to roll-back rent increases.

The council ascribed rising rents to land speculation where in the last ten years, homes which once cost $17,000 now cost $50,000. The council called for control of land prices, but Metro council only called for the province to help those who can afford to buy.

Hart House Theatre: a doughty madame still in her prime STANDING AMONG the proliferation of new theatres in Toronto, Hart House Theatre assumes a mask of venerable respectability. She is in fact one of the grand old ladies of Canadian theatre. Though like most grande dames she has been mistress of many lovers she is still "in her prime" and continues to welcome the advances of fervent young initiates.

In 1919 under the benefice of Toronto's wealthy Massey family, the theatre rose out of the lower depths of basement furnace rooms. It functioned as a community rather than a strictly university theatre and was one of the first places in Canada where Canadian plays were performed. The Massey Foundation and the direction of Vincent and Alice Massey kept the theatre in operation until the years of the second world war. During the war hot-shot stars were replaced by the real thing and the theatre area functioned as a rifle practise range. After the war Vincent Massey turned the theatre over to the University of Toronto and here begins the history of events which formed the theatre as we know it today.

In 1946 a man called Robert Gill was asked to become director of Hart House Theatre. Gill recalls that at that time he had just been offered a part in a Broadway play and was torn between possible stardom and the potential development of a theatre in a relatively unknown place called Toronto. He gambled on the latter choice. As it turned out the Broadway play lasted only four weeks while his run at Hart House has lasted for twenty-six years. (This year Hart House dedicated its one hundredth production, Leaven of Malice, to Robert GILL.)

UNDER GILL Hart House Theatre established a student-oriented policy with a three-fold premise: to introduce undergraduates (most of whom had seen nothing but church basement shows) to theatre, to serve as an extra-curricular activity, and to provide a training ground for people interested in professional theatre careers.

Fifteen years ago, Gill and some associates were able to tabulate a rough list of 106 people who had started in Hart House Theatre and gone on to professional theatre work. Today such a reckoning would be even more formidable, including Hollywood directors Arthur Hiller and George McCowen, tv script writer Stanley Daniels, Barbara Hamilton, Ted Follows, Murray and Donald Davis, Kate Reid (whom Gill first knew as a 17-year-old girl), William Hutt, and Raymond Massey.

During Robert Gill's 20 years (1946-1966) as director of productions at Hart House, traditional plays drawn from Shaw and Shakespeare were favored, for initially the theatre was one of the few in Canada where the classics were performed.

Until Stratford became popular, an annual Shakespearian production was undertaken. At the same time the season's repertoire would include a 'controversial' work or two by playwrights such as Tennessee Williams or Federico Garcia Lorca — controversial because at that time few people could understand the subject matter.

IN 1966 with the formation of the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama, Hart House assumed a new academic function and the bias turned toward more professional productions. Guest directors such as Herbert Whitaker, William Hutt, David Gardner and Leon Major produced shows at Hart House and from 1966-1968 Leon Major held the position of director of productions. After Major left to take over the St. Lawrence Centre, Desmond Scott filled the same spot for another two years.

These were the controversial years for Hart House, many felt that the students had been relegated to a minor place in their own theatre. And while big name professionals trod the boards stardom remained a mere glint in the eye of aspiring young amateurs. The possibility of a walk-on role was just not adequate for the stage-struck student.

After this period of dubious experimentation, the collision of philosophies at Hart House — a student theatre? a professional theatre? a traditional theatre? an exploratory theatre? — gave way to a more viable approach which returned the theatre to the students. This has been the foundation for the last two seasons of Hart House Theatre and includes an intensification of practical theatre training in all aspects of production.

This year, graduate students have been given apprenticeships in stage design, lighting, publicity and direction. Instead of being superseded by the professionals, they are working in joint authority with them; an artistic ideal not always harmonious when strongly creative spirits differ.

In order to bolster a falling attendance, last year's season at Hart House contented itself with what was felt to be an interesting but standard repertoire of classics. Having garnered an 86 per cent attendance, it was decided that this season could be more adventurous, combining classical plays with contemporary and Canadian works.

Five plays instead of the usual four are being presented, a programme which necessitated a budgetary re-evaluation away from production spectacle and the expense of visiting professional dignitaries toward an emphasis on greater acting possibilities and the resources of the university community. This season will therefore reflect as unique amalgam of student, professional and academic talent.

CATALYZING A new enthusiasm for innovative theatrical production are the figures and personalities of Robert Gill, Martin Hunter, (now Supervisor of Productions) and Ann Saddlemeyer of the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama. They have decided to clear away the dust and let the sun shine in.

Which isn't to say that they plan to have Hair, or its equivalent, but it is to say that a play like Sticks and Bones, initially censored from broadcast on American television networks because of its controversial topicality, will have its Canadian premiere at Hart House. (The achievement of such a coup, as told by Martin Hunter, centres around a lady in the copyright office who once knew his mother and not the intrigue of big name contacts as some would suppose.)

Apprentice director Marc Diamond has undertaken full artistic responsibility for Sticks and Bones, the next play of the season. Diamond emphasizes that Bones is not just about the social issues of a young and blind soldier returning from the Vietnamese War but also about a brutal family conflict, as relevant to Canadian life as to American. (Even though the characters happen to be called Ozzie, Harriet, David and Ricky we too have our Nelson family mentality). In its simplest terms, as seen by the director, the play is about a kid who comes back from a profound experience, tries to tell people about it but can't get through to them.

In evaluating the widening of student experience at Hart House, Diamond stresses that university theatre is where the action is. As he points out it is an environment which condones artistic freedom, frees you from the worries of making money on a show and, even more important, allows you to fail. Rather than worry about failure though, he would rather concentrate on finding the truth of each scene and getting everything possible out of the play. "Not everyone will like the play," he says, "But they will be absorbed by it."

TWO PLAYS Peer Gynt, directed by UC English professor F. Marker and Troilus and Cressida, directed by Martin Hunter, were chosen to give young actors a chance to work the classics and to interest university scholars studying the plays this year.

As Hunter explains, Troilus and Cressida hasn't been done at Stratford for 10 years. Apprentice directors are assisting with both these plays which are geared toward an abstract approach, demanding a simplified and rapid paced production. The final play Marsh Hay is by Canadian playwright Merrill Denison, one of the first people to write for Hart House in the early '20's. The play is a realistic piece about backwoods life in the Ottawa Valley and although 50 years old, its bitter comedy evokes a feeling much like David French's play Leaving Home, written only two years ago. Another experienced student director, Richard Plant, assumes responsibility for this production.

The Hart House stage has evolved and changed in accordance with the people who have felt strongly enough about the theatre to imprint their personalities on it, either right in front of the lights or somewhere in the shadowy behind-the-scenes realm.

One such person is business manager James Hozack who started work at Hart House in 1936. Now entering his 38th season with the theatre he says his work has kept him young and that his own contemporaries are just not "with it".

Amidst the turmoil, frustration, sometime success, sometime failure, of theatrical life at Hart House this seems to be a key phrase. There's something about being "with it", in however small a part, that ensures an even longer life for this old lady.

Day for night:

a schizoid look at Truffaut's movie about movies

Mr. Wenlock: "Day for Night is about movie-making. It is concerned with the production of a movie entitled Je vous présente Pamela, a project undertaken by a group of thoroughly professionalized actors and technical persons under the direction of a seemingly well-known filmmaker named Ferrand (played by director François Truffaut himself).

Day for Night opens with what may well be Je vous présente Pamela's opening shot and ends with the dispersal of cast and crew when the filming is complete. The attention of the audience is focussed upon the course of the film-making, although one cannot imagine Pamela as a full length film, and albeit discontinuously upon the courses of the lives of director, cast and crew.

"Je vous présente Pamela is not really a film within a film, as one sees too little of it to regard it as a separate entity and one is forced to regard what one sees of the filming as a form of fictionalized documentary on film-making. This documentary portion is set into the framework of a fictional film (unlike Fellini's Roma for instance). This technique is certainly valid and more certainly not new. It is integral to Moby-Dick. In a more assimilated form it suffuses the novels of Balzac. It forms the structure of Beowulf for that matter. Whether or not this portion of the film is a reliable source of information with regard to the realities of film-making is a question which lies beyond the scope of this reviewer, and of the general audience. One is faced with a display of the hardware and techniques of cinematic production and is convinced.

"However this portion of the film is constantly subordinated to the fictional lives of cast and crew. The audience watches the aging Hollywood-style glamor queen guzzle and fluster her way through her lines and her decay; it hears the aging latin-lover explain the actor's need for love and the fleeting nature of such love; it watches the histrionics of the talented but immature young actor and his equally histrionic girl-friend; it hears the ingenue, who is reassembling her life mouthing forms of the hoary show-must-go-on-in-spite-of-all clichés; and it dreams, with the director, of Orson Welles. Beyond the major figures one catches glimpses of others who are human. However these sightings are so momentary that one cannot identify any palpable individual.

"The film would seem to be a conflation of a documentary on film-making and a series of vignettes and strains of plots which are based on the commonplaces of the dramatic film. Charitably one may view this dependence upon film tradition as inevitable in a movie of this type. Yet one is forced to wonder whether Truffaut would have the audience believe that actors and film crews really are just like the clichés of the film tradition, or has he employed this device for larger, and, to this viewer, anyway, indecipherable purposes?

"Whatever the reason the peculiar nature of the film-makers seems to undercut the impact of the documentary portion. There is no sequence in Day for Night which conveys the sense that the viewer is actually watching the making of a film, particularly not when compared to a successful scene in Roma or even the casting sequence at the end of O Lucky Man. This would not be a fault if the characters were interesting enough to justify the fictionalized quality of the film-making scenes. The characters unfortunately are unable to bear that burden; they are so predictable that there is no possibility of interest.

"In the end Day for Night tells one nothing that one didn't know when he entered the theatre — except, maybe, that to film snow scenes in summer one employs immense quantities of foam.

"This may seem to be a criterion of judgement which, if universally applied, would limit one's movie-viewing severely. However, when a film refuses to hold the viewers' interest by means of plot, or character, structure (L'année dernière à Marienbad for instance) or message as Day for Night refuses, one would seem to have a right to expect something else. That something else does not arrive, wait as one will."

Mr. Edge: "Some of Truffaut's previous films, such as Jules and Jim and Shoot the Piano Player are generally accepted as great, none of them are less than likeable. Thus when he describes Day for Night as the movie he was 'born to make', a long-time fan expects quite something. A negative reaction, such as yours evokes panic and resentment.

"To call the film 'a conflation of a documentary on the mechanics of film-making and a series of vignettes...' is not so much a criticism as an expression of the critic's inability to categorize. Of course Day for Night is one movie about one thing: movie-making, an occupation which forces the director to deal with both machines and people. Often, if he wants to maintain his sanity and to make a movie, he has to deal with both in much the same way. An actress complains that their profession is inhuman and sordid and announces her intentions to withdraw from the world in a scene that is less-than-incidentally reminiscent of Bergman's Persona. Ferrand listens sympathetically and then writes her little tirade into the script. "You have a one-track mind," she tells him.

"To complain that the actor characters are stereotypes is again to miss the point. Truffaut's characters behave a certain way because that is how they have been taught actors behave; and because their relations are so short-lived that they have decided by mutual consent to be instantly comprehensible to one another. Anyone who has ever watched the Dick Cavett show knows that actors really are like that. Truffaut crew members are identifiably human characters.

One does doubt that any group of people could be so delightful and exasperating, but one hasn't the heart to complain. Day for Night is over two hours long; yet one is sorry when it is over. One has had no chance to get to know any of these people, because the plot follows the making of the film, rather than the experience of any one character. One will never see any more of them. Well, that's show biz, as the aging glamor queen laments.

"One hears a lot in some circles about the decline of François Truffaut, how he is making the kind of 'film of quality' that he used to hear to shreds as a critic, that he allows certain situations to fall into patterns which may come very easily to him, but which may not be especially appropriate or desirable. Somebody must have been blunt enough to tell him to his face — the few shots we see of Je vous présente Pamela leave us in no doubt about just how bad he could be if he really decided to go downhill. They are awe-inspiring: the act so subtly stilted, the camera-work such an accurate parody of New Wave style, that it is at times difficult to tell just what it is that makes them so hilariously dreadful. This effect is reinforced by Georges Delarue's music — he wrote the music for a number of Truffaut's movies, including Jules and Jim — the score for Je vous présente Pamela sounds like Mancini apotheosised, or, perhaps, the printout from a computer programmed by Walter Carlos and Burt Bacharach.

"In one of the sequences of Je vous présente Pamela a couple leave their breakfast tray outside the door of their motel cabin. A cat is to come to lap up some milk spilt in a saucer — a typical Truffaut-style charming incident. Of course the specially trained cat provided by Ferrand's prop-man refuses to co-operate — only after thirteen takes, and with the help of a second, untrained, cat, do they succeed in filming it. The sequence is funny and charming — the audience cheered when the cat finally came through — but it makes one wonder: how many takes did Truffaut have to shoot?

"Scenes like these, the film's subject, and the constant affectionate illusions to other films, provide organic alienation effects that keep the audience in a state of ironic detachment. This is important. Truffaut likes making films which are funny and sad at the same time; he has said so. Often, in previous films such as Stolen Kisses the funny things characters do are so endearing, and the sad things are so pathetic, that one suspends all moral judgement; the film comes dangerously close to sentimentality. Day for Night is no less affectionate, but it is cooler. Traits which have made Antoine Doinel so charming in the past sometimes seem a little repulsive when they appear in the character in Day for Night played by the same actor, Jean-Pierre L  aud.

"Day for Night is a celebration of movie-making, by someone who loves it, but behind all the charm and modesty of the style there is uncompromising honesty. I hate to admit it, but the slogan on the posters is right: It is a good movie for people who love movies."

Mr. Wenlock: "I can't agree."
wenlock edge

Director François Truffaut plays a director in his own movie. Are Truffaut's characters superficial or do actors really act that way?

Canadian works fizzle at international festival

Few Torontonians appear to be aware of the Second International Theatre Festival currently at the St. Lawrence Center Town Hall until Nov. 17. Organized by the Multi-Cultural Theatre Association, the festival program consists of mostly one night performances by Czech, Japanese, Finnish, Ukrainian, Hungarian, Armenian, Polish, Latvian, Estonian, Italian, Lithuanian, Bulgarian and German amateur theatre companies. The repertoire ranges from such authors as Moliere (in Latvian) to Ugo Betti in Italian and Duerrenmatt in German to other European playwrights probably unfamiliar to most Canadians.

Less than thirty persons attended the English Canadian entry this Tuesday, two one act plays by Steve Petch and David King presented by the Backdoor Theatre Company. If the choice of plays and productions standards of succeeding companies do not vastly improve, future audiences will not likely be much larger. King's Inane Gesture of Concern, the tiresome ramblings of two men and a woman discussing an unsuccessful rape attempt, was so abysmal as to be unworthy of critical analysis. The actors were particularly atrocious amateurs with neither the locale of the action nor the characters within it clearly established.

By contrast, Steve Petch's The General was of necessity better written and produced. Director-designer Gino Marrocco created a clearly identifiable location and mood with his subdued lighting, storm soundtrack, and his simple suggestive storeroom set of piled boxes and strewn potato sacks. Petch's play about a band of soldiers being killed off by their own officers in some unspecified period is tightly constructed and psychologically interesting. Mia Musilek as a one-armed middle-aged country widow briefly encountering an abandoned young soldier provides the only interesting character study of the evening. The General has really nothing to say, however, least of all something "Canadian", and as with Gesture of Concern one wonders why it was produced.

These two productions are certainly not representative of the English Canadian theatre scene. The choice of text and production standards cast doubt on both the artistic perspicacity of the Multi-Cultural Theatre Association and on the apparently too prolific Playwright's Co-op from which the texts were obtained.

If you're itching to see Moliere in Latvian (and who isn't?) do it before November 17.

Garfunkel makes it on his own--and much more

Angel Clare
Art Garfunkel
Columbia:$6.29

The appeal to memory that Art Garfunkel makes to the listener on the orchestrated intro of the first cut on his solo album, Angel Clare, invites the inevitable comparisons with the other member of rock's once-supreme duo.

Such folk-oriented material as "Down In The Willow Garden", "Woyaya", and the classic "Barbara Allen" suggests that while Paul Simon's muse wrests song-materials out of the urban sprawl (one man's ceiling is another man's floor), Garfunkel's inclinations tend more to the light lyrical ballad statements.

A pair of beautiful Jimmy Webb tunes "All I Know" and "Another Lullaby" serve as reminders that Garfunkel's voice was the soaring tenor that added tremendous power to "Bridge Over Troubled Water". The opening cut on the album sets the mood as "Travelling Boy" subtly blends the string arrangements of Ernie Freeman and Jimmy Haskell with the studio ensemble of artists used on the first Simon Album and on the Bridge Over Troubled Water powerhouse. Larry Knechtel is on keyboards, Joe Osborne plays bass, and the percussive sounds are those of Presley's ex-drummer Hal Blaine, aided by everybody's choice, Jim Gordon. The guitars of such studio cats as Louie Shelton, Larry Carlton, as well as Fred Carter Jr., and such guests as J.J.Cale, Jerry Garcia, and yes, even old mate Paul Simon, offer a fairly safe recommendation that the material on Garfunkel's initial solo offering is first rate.

Mott
Mott The Hoople
Columbia:$6.29

Mott The Hoople is one of those bands that hovers on the brink of immense popularity without crossing the line to superstar status.

Their most recent album may not be of exceptional quality, but it is their most satisfying release to date, combining some heavy rock with witty social commentary and digs into sociological backgrounds of the pop music star. Perfect examples of the probing of these two subject areas may be seen in writer Ian Hunter's lines from "All The Way From Memphis" — "Forgot my six-string razor and hit the sky, / Half way to Memphis before I realized" — or in these from "Whizz Kid" — "She really tried her hardest to make me leave the band, / She even hired a toy 'Renta-Boy' straight from a Times Square Stand".

On many of the nine long cuts on Mott, Ian Hunter and his group display an uncanny similarity to Ray Davies and his Kinks, not merely in the content of their songs' messages, but in general sound and vocal balance. Kinks' fans who pine for a new release from Davies' crew will take one listen to "Violence" or "Drivin' Sister" only to discover that the brilliant musical parody of things British and the Rock and Roll Circus is perpetuated by Mott The Hoople.

Desperado
the Eagles
Asylum/WEA:$8.29

A late summer release that may have been lost in the shuffle of a back-to-studios bonanza of album releases was Desperado by the Eagles. Their second pressing features the finest blending of rock and country components this side of Poco. Don Henley, Glenn Frey, ex-Burrito Bernie Leadon, and former Stone Canyon

Band-member, Randy Meisner, blend their talents to put together a Glyn Johns production recorded at the Island Studios in London. British production doesn't alter the country flavour of the Eagles as they do "Desperado" or the story of "Doclin Dalton". Premier selections are "Tequila Sunrise" and "Certain Kind of Fool" which both display the guitar prowess of Glenn Frey, or the lead-in to "Outlaw Man" which sees Frey and Leadon engaged in a guitar/banjo duel. The waltz tempo of "Saturday Night" is a perfect backdrop to the vocal blend of the Eagles which consists of simple but upper-range harmonies ala the Byrds or the consummate perfection that Poco has for tenor voice-overs.

The Eagles have prepared a unified collection of songs which are all thematically structured on the old-west motif which treats of desperados and outlaws; even the art-work on front and back covers of Desperado is a look at the western heritage. This Eagles' album is a collection of material which shows them near the top of the country-rock hierarchy that contains the Byrds, The Grateful Dead, and of course, Poco.

Shakespeare gets a new approach

There is a new piece of theatre in the city, and, to coin a phrase, it shall be dubbed a political burlesque. George Luscombe, at Toronto Workshop Productions, has staged Richard Third Time, an adaptation of Shakespeare's Richard III, by Steven Bush and Rick McKenna. The purpose of this adaptation is to emphasize the similarities between Shakespeare's Richard and Richard Nixon, a comparison which ultimately works very well, although not frighteningly nor biting so.

The play opens with Nixon's first rise to fame, the McCarthy era, and traces his career through Eisenhower, the rash of assassinations in the 60's and finally culminating with Nixon's "rule" and Watergate.

The dialogue is skillfully and cleverly handled, to juxtapose Shakespeare's verse against modern colloquialism and situation. One beautiful example occurs late in Act II, where Nixon is delivering his "peace with honour" speech, which is laced with lines from the most famous soliloquy of Richard III, "Now is the winter of our discontent . . .". Whole scenes are lifted from the Bard and given a new environment, such as the wooing of Lady Anne, which becomes the wooing of the Southern vote. On the whole, a marvelously clever and sophisticated script, with just the slightest loss of control in Act II.

The staging of the production is exciting and refreshing. Mr. Luscombe juxtaposes medieval and modern conventions. Aided by Nancy Brown's simple set, representing both Richard's "thorny wood" and the medieval Hellmouth, and by John Hughes' expert lighting, the production struck a beautiful balance between Shakespeare and today. Kissingham is established in the role of an Elizabethan fool. The Executioners' scene is handled in a manner reminiscent of Shakespeare's clowns. Yet, the Nixon-Kennedy debate is staged as a boxing match, with Nixon punching and jabbing at Kennedy, who is center stage practising the art of Karate. Two very perfect moments occur when the marionette Ike and Richard are surrounded by the press after Nixon loses the election to Kennedy.

Luscombe's staging owes much to his fine company of energetic actors. There is not a performance to quibble with or even superficially rake over the coals. All played their roles as defined by their wonderful animal costumes, designed by Nancy Brown, plus their roles outlined by the politics of both worlds represented. A special mention for the superb performance of Allan Royal as Richard. He proved to be an excellent game player, darting and changing his mood and emotions like a chameleon his colour. He gave a fine turn to his lines, specially emphasizing the sarcastic and the ironic.

To see some fine and possibly thought-provoking theatre, do not miss this TWP production. It might awaken you to the actuality of the political arena, or merely substantiate what you already know. In the words of Kissingham, "The illegal we will do immediately; the unconstitutional will take a little longer." For fun and profit, drop by the palace and catch Richard Third Time.

Howlin Wolf still knows how Howlin Wolf and his Wolf Gang are at the El Mocambo delivering superior blues until Saturday night.

This is despite the fact that the Wolf himself, who must be by now in his late fifties or early sixties, is past his prime. Four or five years ago, he suffered a heart attack while playing at Toronto's Colonial Tavern. Fiercely independent, he tried to escape from hospital the next day.

He sits in a chair now, and his harmonica sound is not as powerful as it once was, though still more powerful than most. But the man obviously loves to play. Some older blues artists, and I regretfully would class Muddy Waters as one, give the impression that they are trying to get through the numbers as fast as possible, so they can get off the stage. You could hardly say that of the Wolf, who noticeably warmed to requests in the second set, and was only stopped when one of his sidemen took the microphone out of his hands. Howlin Wolf's voice is harsh, like many of his songs, and when he got going they became dramatic commentary on his life, the words thrown into the audience.

Some of the songs which the Wolf (also known as Chester Burnett) has written are among the most famous in blues: It is very difficult to establish authorship of blues songs at the best of times, and Howlin Wolf naturally claims the authorship of almost everything, starting with Walking Blues. I am, however, reasonably sure that Wolf wrote 'Little Red Rooster', 'Built for Comfort' (I'm built for comfort, I ain't built for speed), 'Ridin' in the Moonlight', 'Killin' Floor', 'Sitting on Top of the World', and my personal favorite 'How Many More Years':

I'm goin' to the stairs
Gonna beg her for my clothes
You ask where I'm living
I tell you, outdoors

He gave performances of most of these during the two sets which I saw, as well as doing an excellent job on 'Wang Dang Doodle', and a song Willie Dixon wrote about him, '300 Pounds of Joy'. (Without being fat, he is a big man, thought not 300 pounds any more.)

Besides the Wolf, there are his sidemen, one of whom, Hubert Sumlin, has played with him for 20-odd years. A personal note: It was pointed out to me that Sumlin's two front teeth are missing. Evidently Wolf knocked them out in a fight. Hubert Sumlin is a well-known guitarist in his own right, and deservedly. He is endlessly inventive, and my only complaint was that there was too little of him. The other sidemen include Eddie Shaw, a tenor sax player with a strong soul influence, Detroit 'Junior' on piano and vocals, a very tight drummer, S.P. Leary, and Andy McMann on bass. They managed to reach all corners without much amplification.

Howlin Wolf has been singing blues for close on forty years. He was taught guitar by delta singer Charlie Patton, who died in the late '30's, and harp by the original Sonny Boy Williamson (not Rice Miller. There are two Sonny Boy Williamsons, one who died of an ice-pick blow to the head in 1947, in Chicago, and Rice Miller, popular during the fifties and sixties). Nowadays, the Wolf does not play guitar on stage, though he can be heard for a few bars of slide on The London Howlin Wolf Sessions: With Eric Clapton.

The first major blues artist to head north to Chicago after the war was Muddy Waters. Close on the heels of his success, Howlin Wolf headed north as well. He was at the heart of the new urban blues of the late forties and fifties, and an album consisting of sessions he recorded between 1952 and 1958, entitled Evil, on Chess, is recommended as his best.

New York Dolls show features big-city hype

The Mississauga Ladies' Thursday Bridge Club struck this demure pose for our itinerant photog.

Boys and girls of all sexes gathered at the Victory Theatre on the weekend to see and hear a presentation by the much-heralded New York Dolls. They appeared in full makeup, wigs, ladies' high heels, ladies' cossack boots with spurs, satin pink tights, a set of pink drums, and...well, you get the idea.

Vocalist David Jo Hansen bears a strong resemblance to Mick Jagger and screeches in a monotone. Wow. Their "visuals" consisted of a fake machine gun rigged up to project a strobe light when the trigger was pulled with which Hansen "gunned down" the audience as an accompaniment to their song "I've Got A Vietnamese Baby On My Mind". This aside from various feminine gyrations and Hansen showing off the cleavage of his behind, I mean, tasteful.

Hansen's diction was so fine I couldn't pick out a word that was sung, and maybe it's just as well. In introducing one of the songs (and I use these terms for convenience only) several references were made to the Queens section of New York, but nobody got the joke. Amazingly, they paused at one point to tune up and I really wondered why they bothered. All evening I listened hard for something resembling music amidst the assorted deafening noises they made, but was disappointed. It was a rock concert in name only.

We all know how "hype" can transform nobodies into overnight superstars, but I've never before seen or even imagined such a blatant example of bullshit passed off as something worth seeing. And at four bucks a ticket yet.

By the way, someone ought to tell them that the blues classic they murdered, "Hootchie Kootchie Man" isn't by Muddy Waters. It was written by Willie Dixon.

Or course they loved the runway at the Victory, and they liked Toronto too. According to Hansen, "Toronto queens are just wonderful!"

David Bromberg, renowned far and wide for the scintillating quality of his licks, is not playing in Toronto any more. Better luck next time.

David Bromberg offers dazzling guitar work, sensitive and funny songs

If you've ever seen David Bromberg perform it was likely at the Mariposa Folk Festival in 1971 or '72. He didn't sing much but he dazzled the eyes and ears off of everyone and proved he was the best guitar picker this side of the Mississippi. Bromberg was back in town earlier this week and it was clear that if you haven't listened to him since those Mariposa days then you're missing something.

Bromberg is the son of a psychiatrist from Tarrytown, NY. He learned guitar from Mel Bay books and quickly graduated to the folk scene in Greenwich Village. His skill and expertise on stringed instruments gained him the respect and admiration of many a musician. But for a long time Bromberg was in the background, adding his guitar licks on other people's records. He worked with Jerry Jeff Walker for two years and can be heard on albums by Dylan (New Morning and Nashville Skyline) and John Prine among others. But there's less studio work now that Bromberg is more deeply involved in his own songs and his performing.

From the onset of Bromberg's first set at the Riverboat Tuesday, it was apparent that the full house was primed for what was to follow. Bromberg launched into a full blossomed version of his own tune "Hard Workin' John", with his fingers flashing over the frets of his guitar. His backup band was most unconventional — a fiddle, bass, cornet and saxophone.

Most of the live set was like Bromberg's albums

— no real format, just a lot of good music. Bromberg manages to deliver equal measures of humor and emotion within a framework of sensitive and intricate guitar playing.

"You might have guessed by now that this is not the slickest act in town" quipped Bromberg as he started a raunchy version of Wilber Harrison's "Kansas City" complete with the horns blaring in the background. All the familiar songs were played with a new freshness, the band improvising as much as possible, and the music and lyrics evolving to fit the mood of the evening. That was especially the case with the treatment of the Bromberg composition "Sharon". The main character of the song works the girlie show in a small town carnival and Bromberg uses some splendidly innovative riffs to illustrate her hypnotic movements.

Bromberg has two albums to his credit and says he's already finished two more, that he's holding for future release. Bromberg probably describes himself best in his own song, "Demon In Disguise".

*Don't let the glasses fool you;
Stand beside
Me when you measure my size. . .
I've been a wizard since my childhood
And I have earned some respect for my art. . .
Don't let false estimations rule you;
Some evening you might come and realize
I am a demon in disguise.*

Shankar performs brilliantly at York concert

This Monday witnessed one of those fleeting visits of Ravi Shankar, that occur not nearly often enough. Despite the dismal weather, York University's Burton Auditorium was packed with an audience eagerly anticipant for music from this guru and master artist.

The previously unannounced programme was laid out as the evening progressed; four ragas and a tabla solo, the latter by Ustad Alla Rakha whose playing was, as usual, not only brilliant, but delightful. Shankar seemed tense as he started into "Raga Poorvi", but as the strong, simple rhythms of its last part were developed, he settled into his more usual entirely-absorbed way of playing. The second, though Hindustani in style, was based on Karnatic raga, with a display of rhythmic complexity. Its fast movement was brilliant. Begeshwari Raga for solo sitar and Tamboura was of the classical sixteenth century style, and Shankar showed strong sensitivity and awareness to the moods and directions of this piece, as was also shown in the last raga, Manj Khamaj. Here the indulgence in tones and rhythms led to a lengthy and brilliant interaction between tabla and sitar and to ultimate recaptulation of the central themes. It was worth passing through cheerless weather to be transposed to the heights of this performance.

You may recall reading a piece in the Varsity Review called Why Are You Reading This by John McAndrew. It presented a witty ironic slant on theatre styles and why people don't go to plays (he might try a follow-up on Why People Do Go To The Theatre). McAndrew is also one of the writers for a cabaret style spoof on Canadian consciousness The Group of Seven and The Case of the Glowing Pine, now playing at the Poor Alex. The show doesn't aim for hard-edged, political or social satire (and that's probably Canadian too) but has mocking fun with carefully worked out reflections of our venerated institutions and representative trademarks: the RCMP, Brebeuf (a determined martyr), the Group of Seven,

Take It With You at the Palmerston Library Theatre, 560 Palmerston. It runs Nov. 1 - 10 at 8:30. Tiny Alice, a play by Edward Albee, is currently being performed at the Actors Theatre, 390 Dupont St. Student tickets are $2.50. And in the midst of the real life Watergate drama, constantly hovering between melodrama and tragi-comedy, Toronto Workshop Productions continue their Richard Third Time - a disturbingly accurate political cartoon starring a maniacal loser who nevertheless manipulates his way to the greatest power in the land. Structured on a cut-up version of Shakespeare's Richard III, it creates amazing parallels between ghoulish and greedy characters of two different ages.

This Sunday evening, Les Percussions de Strasbourg, a French new-music ensemble will be giving a show in the Concert Hall of the Edward Johnson Building, a must for any fan of the avant-garde school of composers.

This week's TSO concert features former Music Director Walter Susskind in a performance of The Sorcerer's Apprentice (Dukas) and three of the six tone poems from Smetana's Ma Vlast ("My Fatherland"). The tone poems were scheduled for complete performance last year, but Ancerl took sick with hepatitis and the performance had to be called off. This rendition may serve as a memorial to him, but the whole year could be said to do just that. The evening's featured soloist is Mayumi Fujikawa, who will play Tchaikovsky's D minor concerto, which is always a delight to hear, especially if you're not overly familiar with it. $3 to $7.50 at one box office.

Wagner fans take note: Sunday night at 7:03 p.m., CBD presents Das Rheingold as recorded at this year's Bayreuth festival. The series will include the complete Ring Cycle and some other operatic works. That same night at 11:03, the Midnight Jazz show takes a look at jazz interpretations of the classics, featuring Buch, Chopin, Scriabin, Bartok and others.

A sense of deja-vu sets in reading the lists of repertory and film society showings. Catch-22 is the SAC movie at the Medical Sciences auditorium tonight, but it has played or will play five or six times more in several months. Rarely a week has gone by without someone showing Fritz Lang's Metropolis: this week it's Monday night at Ontario College of Art. Is there someone who hasn't seen the Monty Python movie? (Saturday midnight at the Roxy). In effect we have one repertory programme taking in various theatres.

The Revue ventures off the Playlist a bit Monday and Tuesday night when it shows The King of Marvin Gardens. The movie flopped when it arrived last Christmas, but I really liked it. It is of a piece with Drive, He Said, which also flopped and which I also thought was great, and Five Easy Pieces - colourful movies about grey areas. All three films have a whole company of names in common, the best-known of which is Jack Nicholson's. If you liked Five Easy Pieces you might catch King of Marvin Gardens. It likely won't surface again for awhile. (Marvin Gardens is double-billed with Fat City which comes around all the time. I thought it was a bore.)

For the rest of the week the Revue goes with Bunuel's The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, a funny and haunting double-bill by an acknowledged master who is still very much up to form. It is one of the better movies on the playlist.

Best double-bill of the week for grizzly movies involving crazy women: Thursday night, Images and Suddenly Last Summer at the Roxy. Aaaiaaaaa.

Rumours: I Even Met Happy Gypsies will be back for two days in January. The Projectionist is not really a movie, just a title, and no-one has ever seen it.

Wendy Waldman makes the Riverboat worth the price - for once.

Labatt's 50 and Canadian "peace-makers" in foreign lands. It's one of the first really scintillating looks at our dead-pan nation and throws that dead-pan mask right back at us. Student rush tickets are $2.00.

Of interest on campus is a production by Pociul Ludique Societas, the medieval and early Tudor drama group at the Centre for Medieval Studies, who are performing Fulgens and Lucrea. Termed A Godely Interlude (a goodly interlude), it plays tonight at 8:30 and tomorrow at 3:00 in the West Hall, University College. Admission is free.

Also on campus, Nov. 8 - 10 at 8:30 pm UC Playhouse will present Istanbul, written by Rochelle (Futz) Owens and directed by Milton Branton. The play concerns two Norman crusaders who find love and intrigue in 15th century Constantinople. Limited seating necessitates reservations. Call 928-6307.

Around town, the Q Theatre Company are doing Kaufman and Hart's You Can't classical

As the essay season approaches, with all its horrors, there's not much time to get out and see live entertainment. Sadists in the student body can get their jollies by lurking about the libraries, watching their fellows go into fits of craven panic as deadlines approach with no conceivable end in sight. What's left for us "normal" people?

Well, Monday evening at 8:15, the Faculty of Music comes up with Christine Kuerti (cello) in a recital, free of charge. On Thursday afternoon at 2:10, the wind ensemble of Eastman School of Music will be giving a performance, with no advance tickets required. This one should be a good bet for fans of contemporary music.

That same evening, the King's Singers, a group of former Oxford students will be giving a concert. It's at 8:30; bring your student card and get in for half price ($2).

I usually find that entertainment at the Riverboat is a touch expensive. Unless I have a particular interest in a performer, the $3.50 cover charge coupled with the way you get herded out after each set, keeps me away. But I really believe you should be aware of a new performer who's playing there tonight and tomorrow. Wendy Waldman, is a southern California singer-songwriter, who just completed her first album for Warner Brothers. The LP called "love Has Got Me", won a rave review in the latest issue of Rolling Stone. Her performance at the Riverboat was dynamic and uplifting making full use of her talented backup band which included Carmi Simon on guitar, mandolin and dobro, Paul Dylan on drums and Peter Berstein on bass. Wendy is followed by David Wilfen who opens on Tuesday. Call 922-6216 for more information.

Laxer traces route of dependence

By WAYNE ROBERTS

The "British Connection" was the political thriller in the Waffle lecture at OISE Sunday evening, as Jim Laxer spoke on the national policy and the evolution of Canada as a dependent capitalist economy.

Taking the period from 1880 to 1914 as "the formative years in the evolution of Canadian capitalism," he saw national policy as operating "preeminently for commercial capitalists."

Despite this however, and despite "the daring strategy of building a railway to the west before wheat could even grow there," this period marked the achievement of an integrated national economy.

The development of two transcontinental railways and of internal domestic trade between the provinces characterized the period, he said.

The Americanization of the Canadian economy was just beginning in this period, he stated. Throughout the Laurier period, British portfolio investment had overwhelming dominance.

As late as 1913 Canada's 450 American branch plants represented only 10 per cent of total capitalization. While Canadian trade and tariff policy encouraged these branch plants, dependence on the British metropolis for capital and trade remained crucial.

The 1911 election, he argued, was a victory for the British connection and for British portfolio investment.

Laxer discussed the major political debates of this period between imperialists and continentalists as typical of "dependent capitalist ideologies." There was no independentist alternative.

This lecture series marks a number of important developments over last year's series on the Political Economy of Canada. "Both fit into the Waffle's broad attempts to analyse Canadian politics and society," Laxer said.

But the focus of this series on political institutions and the state is the result of a political evolution in the Waffle. One of the critical distinctions between social democracy and socialism is a view of the state, he said. This course is intended to show the state as a class instrument. "In that sense it has a lot to do with our forming a new political party" in opposition to the NDP, he told the Varsity.

Close Waffle watchers also noted that Laxer offered what he termed "a strongly modified" view of Tom Naylor's view of Canadian economic history. Naylor, whose views dominated last year's course, treated Canada as dominated by a class of strictly commercial capitalists who had irretrievably tied Canada to the American empire early in the nineteenth century. Laxer sees crucial Americanization of the economy as postdating World War I.

New Democrats fear inner change: Harney

By WAYNE ROBERTS

As a person rises in the New Democratic Party apparatus, his concern is more and more with maintenance and less and less with change in society and within the party, John Harney, an NDP MP, said Wednesday night.

"Every step up in the party is a step to the right," Harney said to explain what he calls Harney's law, an elaboration of a theory by Robert Michels about the rigidity of oligarchies.

Harney told the NDP audience at OISE that he "came not to praise the party but to criticize it."

The NDP is different from the other parties in being more democratic, he maintained. In fact, it is the only party, he said, since the others are just associations tied to parliamentary caucuses.

Harney offered a number of explanations for the tendency toward organizational and political conservatism and neglect of internal democracy. "There is nothing so resistant to internal change as a party devoted to social change," he said. The beleaguered atmosphere of a radical party can lead to unfair treatment of internal opponents.

Harney was most critical in his comments of party membership involvement at the federal level. "Nothing is so sacred as a riding resolution and nothing so neglected," he lamented.

The essential provincial structure of the party, he said, offered few structural opportunities to control the federal caucus. The federal council meets seldom and is responsible in an ongoing way to no-one.

There is much more of an "establishment" in the federal party, he continued, people who are in power whether elected or not. He laid the brunt of the blame for this on the trade unions and their tendency to appoint what he called "porkchoppers" to political positions.

Hart House Sunday Evening Concerts cure melancholia.

Two or three seem so little, one seems nothing:
In deserts, forests, crowds, or by the shore,
There solitude, we know, has her full growth in
The spots which were her realms for everyone;
But in a mighty hall or gallery, both in
More modern buildings and those built of yore,
A kind of death comes o'er us all alone,
Seeing what's meant for many with but one.

A neat, snug study on a winter's night,
A book, friend, single lady, or a glass
Of claret, sandwich, and an appetite,
Are things which make an English evening pass;
Though certes by no means so grand a sight
As is a theatre lit up by gas.
I pass my evenings in long galleries solely,
And that's the reasons I'm so melancholy.

No, no, go not to Lethe,...
Come to the Great Hall

York ravages Blues in rugby

By JAMES MacDONALD

On Wednesday night, in weather not suited for a passing game that the Blues with their strong three-quarters line were hoping for, the York Yeomen came up with their second win against the U of T.

As the game started in the rain it was evident that it was to be a night for the forwards to work hard. The Blues' pack went to work right away and applied pressure to York's defence but the Yeomen's old ally, the kick, came to their aid for the first of several times in the course of the evening.

There was no scoring in the first half as Toronto had the ball the majority of the time but were unable to capitalize. Although the ball was very greasy the Blues were able to show a number of good passing movements one of which came within inches of scoring as winger Tom Wright was wrestled out over the corner flag.

The second half continued with much the same play as both teams became even more bogged down in the mud of Varsity Stadium. Line-out play and the scrums were on the whole equal while in the backs Toronto still went with the pass and run and York retaliated with the punt.

It was early in the half when winger Wright was put out of the game by a late and strictly illegal cross-body tackle. It is interesting to note that the tackler was also shaken up on the play. A lot of pain could have been avoided if a legal tackle had been used! The game slowed and a number of penalties were awarded due to the conditions caused by the omnipresent rain.

Late in the half, on one of their few penetrations, the Yeomen were awarded a penalty kick 20 yards out which Raponi, the scourge of the Blues, managed to curve through the posts with the help of the wind. Behind 3-0, the Blues immediately went on the attack and for the next ten minutes the ball rarely got outside of York's 25 as the Toronto pack took control.

Yet the Blues were to be denied a try although they came within inches. Thus the Blues missed a win which surely would have been theirs under different weather conditions. York, still undefeated, clinched the eastern division with that win although they still have a game against the Gaels on Saturday.

The second XV were beaten by the York intermediates 9-0 on three penalty goals. Although the Blues appeared to be superior throughout most of the game they gave it to York by giving up numerous penalties with 13 in the first half alone.

All the points were scored in the first half as the Toronto team had a tendency to commit fouls near their own goal-line. In the second half this trend by the Blues moved into York's half as Toronto constantly gave up good field position by stupid penalties. However between the kicks the Toronto pack showed good power and ball sense along with a great deal of hustle while the backs were sharp on defensive play.

This was not enough as the Blues finished off their season with 3 straight defeats, after starting with three wins.

Blues reign might end

By DAVID COOK

The hockey Blues open their 73-74 OUAA season against McMaster Marlin's in Hamilton Saturday afternoon. The season is shaping to be an interesting one since some coaches and analysts are projecting that the Blues can expect a serious challenge to their hockey reign.

Hopes of faring better against the Blues this year are being fanned by the fact that the team recently had a disastrous Western Canada exhibition trip.

Last weekend they dropped two games to the University of Calgary 5-4 and 4-2. They also found themselves on the short end of the score losing 4-3 to the University of Alberta. However, Blues played an excellent game beating the Golden Bears of Alberta 3-1.

Blues' coach Tom Watt however is optimistic about this year's team and was pleased with their showing on the road trip out west. He is happy that his younger players have gained the experience.

To say that the Blues are young and somewhat inexperienced is quite an understatement. Blues' championship team of last year has been seriously depleted by the loss of some excellent players.

Replacing the likes of all star Bill Buba who was the scoring champion of the east division last season, all-Canadian Bob Munro and forwards Neil Korzack, Bruce Herridge, Nick Holmes and versatile Mike Keenan won't be easy.

A particularly tough loss from last year's team is the loss of the excellent goaltending combo of all star Bruce Durno and Gary Inness. Durno had a league leading goals average of 1.8, while Inness finished with a 2.6 mark.

game a Forestry player travelled (incognito) through endzone with a screen pass to capture the win.

Many jock supporters were visibly moved as PHE ran by Vic 20-7 yesterday. Second-half touchdowns by Curran and Abbot aided and abetted the pillage.

After the musical wind tossed several short passes into orbit, both teams settled down to a conservative ground game.

PHE took an innocuous 1-0 lead as a vainglorious field-goal attempt by Nedoshytko went wide for a single. There was no more scoring in the half even with several female spectators smiling encouragingly.

In the third quarter, Abbot hoed his way through several defenders into the endzone. His team-mate

With regard to the exhibition losses out west, Coach Watt pointed out that both Calgary and Alberta have good teams: "We played the University of Alberta in the CIAU semi-finals last year", and that speaks for itself. "The games were close and one weakness we had was our inability to score. If you want to win intercollegiate games you have to be able to put goals in the net."

Alberta and Calgary had played several exhibition games prior to their matches with the Blues. Toronto had managed only a sixty minute scrimmage with the Orilla Terriers of the OHA Senior A prior to their western trip. This, coupled with travelling hassles and time differences, put the Blues in a bad position for their opening game against Calgary.

Coach Watt said that many of the ten players that he has from last year's team saw only limited service throughout the season. Fifteen of the twenty players on the team are juniors and need the college experience. Watt expects to have at least nine junior players in the starting lineup.

The unexpected return of ex-captain Gord Davies and Don Pagnutti, second highest scorer in the eastern division, are pleasant surprises for Watt. Both made unsuccessful bids with NHL teams this fall.

Also returning from last year's team, which brought the University of Toronto its eighth straight league and fifth consecutive national title, are defencemen Al Milnes, all-Canadian Warren Anderson, Rick Cornacchia and Alby Shames. Returning forwards include scoring ace Kent Runlike who notched 22 goals in 17 games last season, as well as Harry Sems, Bill Fifield and Ivan McFarlane.

As usual Blues have an excellent crop of rookies. Rookie Goalers Jim Campbell and Mike Brown are looking good. Campbell practiced last year with the Blues although he didn't play any games and Brown played the past two years with the St. Michaels Buzzers of the OHA Junior B league.

The two rookie defencemen are both big and strong. Chuck Luksa has Junior A experience with Kenora and Oshawa and Mike Lauder had junior experience with Wexford of the Provincial Junior A league.

Rookie forwards include Doug Herridge who played with the North York Rangers, Larry Hopkins an Oshawa General products, and a tough rookie with a flair for scoring in Ron Harris. Other rookie forwards are Bill Hews, John Richmond, Randy Curran and Roman Kniginzky, who played in the interfaculty league last season with Erindale college.

Blues have a big, strong, fast team. The squad has a great deal of potential and the smart money is still with the Blues although a few teams are forecasting that they will definitely be giving a better account of themselves this season.

Blues main threat for east division honors could again come from their upturn rivals, York Yeomen. Also watch for a strong showing from Laurentian Voyageurs, 73-74 runners-up to Blues. According to Waterloo Warriors' coach Bob McKillop his team will be in the thick of things also. Warriors defeated York in exhibition play 4-3.

Royal Military College joins the league this season and the battle of the cellar between them and Ryerson High should be interesting.

die and a tight end but no-one bothered to score. Not, that is, until Eng's O.J. Smith quick-kicked from the 50 on second down for a long signal (to be released next week by Columbia).

No player (and there were many) deigned to score again and give the Varsity some good copy. So fire on ye all, varlets, and the gods visit ye with a just reward.

Three buffoons, led by Varsity news editor Paul McGrath disgraced themselves as stickmen. McGrath also dishonored a thousand years of down-marking tradition by cheering lustily for both side. Varsity sports fearlessly exposes this and all other corruption in high officialdom and will continue to do so (just keep those checks coming).

Football follies continue to amaze

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Trinity's football team appeared on the field Wednesday in make-up and other disguises. (Possibly they were preparing for a road trip to the St. Charles Halloween night.)

Unabashed, New let a few surprises out of the closet themselves (Coleman and Newfelt), and forcibly reaped 13-0 win.

Unless Trinity suddenly includes in its latent tendencies the ability to score, New will eliminate them easily in the upcoming division II playoffs.

On the fifth play of the game, Newfelt displayed a mental quirk of his (a tendency to deviate from the defenders' norm) as he romped around the end for a TD. Salkely's convert fluttered wide and New led 6-0.

In the second quarter, New salvaged a single point as an immoral field-goal attempt by Salkely fell by the wayside.

In the last minute of the second quarter, Trin QB Wright ministerially directed a drive from their own 20. Two long passes to Howse and an interference call later, Trin perched enthusiastically at the New 17.

However someone ran the film backwards and Trinity found themselves third and thirty at mid-field as the referee signalled the end of the half.

Midway through the third quarter Trin threatened again as Poulos (first cousin to a gazelle) sprinted with a pass to the New 3 yard line. New's defence (no strangers to homicidal mania) declared open season on all such wild-life and Trinity saw its last hopes plugged.

Newfelt loped over the goal-line for his second TD (unconverted) to complete New's score.

The same afternoon cellar-dwelling Forestry came from behind to stain Scarborough 14-7. The foresters won their first (and last) game this year, ripping out Scarborough's jugular like loose weather-stripping late in the fourth quarter.

On the ninth play of the game Henderson wriggled over from the 4 to give Scar a TD. Ellis converted to establish a 7-0 lead.

Forestry scored a long time later when their QB Clark connected with a wobbly pass to Vincent for a TD. On the last play of the half, Forestry missed the convert and trailed 7-6.

In the third quarter, Forestry inadvertently tied it when a Scar defensive back intercepted to prevent a TD. Before he could flee the endzone with his ill-gotten gains he was tackled for a single point.

Large demo supports UFW

By ANDREW FALUDY

More than 1,000 demonstrators including several members of city council gathered at Queen's Park Saturday in support of the boycott of California grapes and lettuce.

Singing and chanting as they marched down Bay Street on their way to an ecumenical service at St. Michael's Cathedral, their message was clear and simple — boycott grapes, boycott lettuce.

The march was an important event in the United Farm Workers Union (UFW) campaign because Toronto is the third largest consumer of California table grapes. Success here would certainly strengthen the position of the UFW against the grape and lettuce growers who have not signed union contracts.

In California, as in Ontario, farmworkers have been specifically excluded from labor legislation which otherwise might enable them to negotiate a decent minimum wage.

In 1970, as a result of the long and successful boycott of California grapes, the growers finally began to sign three year contracts with the UFW.

When those contracts expired earlier this year, grape growers began signing new contracts with the Teamsters Union, a move UFW organizers claimed undermined their movement.

However, the Teamsters have moved out of farmworker organizing, leaving the current situation of contracts with no union for the workers. The UFW has started its grape boycott again to force the growers to re-sign with the UFW as they did three years ago.

To this end, Torontonians had to be made more aware of the situation, UFW organizers said.

At the service which followed the march, clergy from various denominations spoke out in support of the boycott.

Philip Pocock, Anglican Archbishop of Toronto came out strongly in support of the workers; "We stand for the right of every worker to a minimum wage that will support a man, woman or a family in frugal comfort," he declared from the pulpit.

In his sermon, Fr. B. Massman, the director of the Roman Catholic Social Action Department commented bitterly on the life expectancy of the average farm worker which is only 49 years.

"This is a sin. He (the farmworker) is being cheated."

Those who came to hear Chavez speak were disappointed. When he finally spoke later on in the service, it was only to thank the various churches for their support.

Churches rank high in the long list of the boycott's supporters, which include Toronto Mayor David Crombie and city council and U of T's Students' Administrative Council.

Picketing of major chain stores which carry California grapes and lettuce is expected to start next weekend.

Picketing of stores in Toronto in support of the grape boycott two years ago brought a court injunction against the farmworkers following a demonstration in front of Darrigo's grocery store on St. Clair Avenue West.

That court injunction prohibiting picketing still stands in effect.

The Varsity—David Lloyd

UFW leader Cesar Chavez spoke at Massey Hall Friday, and said picketing of chain stores is imminent.

No parity committee to study parity, says Evans

By DICK BROWN

University of Toronto president John Evans has rejected a demand from SAC that a committee with student parity be set up by the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council to decide the issue of student parity in staffing decisions.

In Evans' reply to the Forster report on academic appointments, which Evans will present to academic affairs along with the report itself at its meeting tomorrow, Evans says of the SAC demand:

"I did not think a new committee would be appropriate at this stage, but I undertook to indicate to the Academic Affairs Committee the deep concern of the SAC on the issue of student representation."

The Forster report was released last August and called for no student participation in hiring, firing, tenure and staffing decisions.

Evans' reply does not take a stand on the issue, but says instead: "Any attempted solution of this problem is foredoomed to failure if it dismisses or ignores either the faculty viewpoint or the student viewpoint."

However in an oblique reference, Evans seems to favor a proposal in the Forster report which denies student participation.

The Forster report proposed a number of models for departmental committees deciding tenure and staffing. One of the models would contain student representation, but the remaining three do not.

While commenting on the desirability of departmental committees having either a strong input from a given department, or instead a strong input from outside the department, Evans opted for the latter model.

However, that model for a tenure committee also does not include any notion of student participation.

In the 21-page reply to the Forster report, Evans devotes a page of single-spaced typewritten summary of various point of view on the student participation issue, including:

"The main thrust of the SAC submission (SAC's reply to the Forster report), is that it is crucially important for teaching to be evaluated and given a real weight in the tenure consideration.

"Most of the university community would agree with that objective; the controversial matter is the appropriate mechanism for attaining it.

"The majority of students favor direct student representation on tenure committees because they feel that otherwise insufficient weight will be given to teaching.

"One senses that the majority of faculty acknowledge the importance of including a student assessment of a professor's teaching as evidence to be considered in the decision, but reject direct student representation on the committees on grounds which relate to maturity of judgement, confidentiality, and politicization of the process."

A recommendation in the Forster report, which brought a sharp minority dissension in the report itself and from the faculty association, is a contingency plan to fire tenured teaching staff should the university face a financial pinch at some time in the future.

Evans' reply to that proposal was that "the possibility must be considered" that a financial squeeze could occur.

His suggestion for handling the problem: "If it is the consensus that the fiscal problems may require faculty reduction beyond attrition I would recommend the calling of a student group with representation from the University of Toronto Faculty Association."

However, Evans does not even mention students or student participation in such a study group to examine the problem of firing tenured professors for financial reasons.

Evans reply to the Forster report in general is to endorse and recommend implementation of all of the report which has not been criticized by various factions at the university.

On those areas which have been controversial — such as student participation and the criteria for tenure — he urges further study without taking a clear-cut stand.

The Forster report recommends that the criteria for granting of tenure be research and publication, teaching ability, and future promise of intellectual development. The report rejects community service as a factor in deciding tenure.

The report deals in detail with how to judge research and publication, but skirts over the two other criteria lightly in determining how they are to be measured.

Evans notes that there has been disagreement with this approach: "Among the criteria listed above, the (Forster) task force stresses only teaching and research."

"Comments received from many divisions in the university have indicated a belief that university and community service should be taken into consideration..."

"The works by which he shall be known" do not always, for professional faculty members, appear in the conventional scholarly literature.

"The evidence of accomplishments in this area may appear in steel and concrete, in codes of practice, in legislation, in cured patients, in policies adopted by public bodies."

Evans recommendation from this is that "a list of explicit criteria be adopted for all divisions of the university, that each academic division be asked to indicate the relative weight to be attached to each of the criteria for the specific situations of tenure, promotions and salary increases and that these divisional reports be returned for review by the academic affairs committee."

Evans does not say in his reply what the "explicit criteria" for tenure ought to be.

He endorses the procedures for the granting of tenure which the Forster report outlines, except those clauses which have generated dissent within the university.

The Forster report proposes that an associate professor be considered for tenure between his or her third and fifth year at the university. The report says the candidate should submit such publications and other written matter to the department chairman, but the candidate would not necessarily be called to appear before the committee.

The secretive closed-door character of tenure decisions was sharply criticised by the faculty association which said the candidate ought to have the right to appear before the departmental tenure committee.

Without mentioning the faculty association objections, Evans' reply recommends that the issue of the candidate appearing before the departmental committee be given "further consideration."

Evans' also pushes off the idea of a university-wide committee to automatically review all departmental tenure decisions, by suggesting further discussion.

The Forster report had made the recommendation of the university-wide committee because of the large number of appeals of negative tenure decisions.

Evans' suggests "further discussion" of the issue after the Forster recommendations are brought into effect saying that the new procedures ought to be tried out to see if they relieve the problem before creating a new layer of bureaucracy.

Evans agrees substantially with the recommendations of the Forster report about dismissal for cause, the only current method of firing a tenured professor.

The Forster report suggests the present Haist rules be changed slightly to define what "cause" is. Evans indicates his agreement subject to the approval of the university's lawyers.

Yes, that's right. We are most assuredly angry, to say the least. People complain about the paper, stand on it, spit on it, use it for wrapping fish, the cat's litter and lining cupboards, but we're damned if we can find anybody who wants to come and work for it. And God forbid we should take a holiday. The phone never stops ringing on the days we don't publish. It's incomprehensible.

It's as simple as this. If you want the pleasure of a news service and information bureau, you're going to have to do something about it. We've been running ads all year asking for staff and the response has been underwhelming. It's hard to exist on the slim number of reporters that show up here. This is the student newspaper, it's a volunteer newspaper, so each student has a responsibility to make it better. There is a lot to be done, and few people to do it. Notice how slim the papers are

We reiterate that it is not hard to do the things required to put this paper in your hands three days a week. It's not very time-consuming, it's interesting and it's great experience. This paper is a valuable service on campus, an alternate informer on what's going on here and in the outside world.

150 protest continuing repression in Chile

By BARRY WEISLEDER

About 150 people turned out Sunday to mark the International Day of Solidarity with Chile, in opposition to the military junta in power there and the severe political repression it continues to conduct.

The marchers made their way from Allan Gardens over to the American consulate on University Avenue, chanting as they walked, "ITT, CIA, Behind the Coup in Chile!" and "Out the Generals, Workers to Power." A peaceful picket was held at the consulate, under the watchful eyes of Metro's finest.

Along the way, the demonstration paused at the partly ITT-owned Four Seasons-Sheraton Hotel on Queen St. opposite City Hall. ITT has been known for its interference in Chilean political and economic affairs.

At the hotel, leaders of the Chile Solidarity Committee, organizer of the march, addressed the protesters. Speaking for the committee, Greg McMaster reported on the present situation in Chile.

"Since the coup," he stated, "the workers' organizations have regrouped their surviving forces and are beginning to make plans for a strategic offensive. The MIR (Movement of the Revolutionary Left) have joined with the Communist Party in a military united front" to co-ordinate the coming armed struggle.

Despite the mounting toll of political assassinations, (estimated at already by the New York Times 30,000), some key left-wing figures have been reported to have escaped the repression. The demonstrators were told that Miguel Enriquez, leader of the MIR, was alive and in touch with his organization.

Hugo Blanco, a Peruvian Trotskyist who had taken refuge in Chile during Allende's reign, is known to have escaped to Sweden.

Luis Corvalan, head of the Chilean Communist Party, is also still alive, but still remains in jail. Efforts to secure his release and that of the thousands of other political prisoners, being organized internationally, will be an important part of the future work of the Chile Solidarity Committee in Canada.

But these efforts will not in the least be aided by the Canadian government, McMaster argued.

He went on to say, "the role of our own government fits in quite comfortably with that of the US, of the Chilean right, of the entire imperialist spiderweb. Canada was one of the first countries to recognize the junta."

It was from here that "De Havilland Aircraft made a deal to ship planes to the generals the day after recognition, when the dead bodies were still warm in the occupied factories that were bombed by the Chilean air force."

He pointed out that, "the Canadian Embassy in Santiago has closed its doors on the refugees who must flee Chile or face certain death. To date, Canada has admitted a handful of refugees. But how are they received? With RCMP interrogation and the threat of being deported to Chile if they do not receive landed immigrant status, which they have not to date." The demonstrators were urged to continue pressuring for a change in this policy.

Activity around defense of the Chilean workers' movement will not cease in the coming period. In a press release distributed by the Toronto-based Latin American Working Group, (LAWG), it is stated that Hortensia Bussi de Allende, the widow of the late President of Chile, will tour Canada during the second half of November, 1973. Fernanda Navarro, Mrs. Allende's personal secretary, visited Toronto recently to confirm initial arrangements.

If time permits, her tour will include stops in Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec City, and Toronto. Toronto arrangements will be organized by representatives from various groups, including the Chilean Students' Association, the Chile Solidarity Committee, the Canadian Committee for Solidarity with Democratic Chile, and the Chile-Canada Solidarity (LAWG), in the first common effort these groups have been able to accomplish.

Hello Canada, and hockey fans in Oshawa

Radio Varsity and its hockey commentators Archie Hunter and Rick Michalak are headed for the big time.

Since the beginning of the hockey season for the newly-established Toronto Toros, the station has been carrying all Toro home games on their Rogers Cable TV outlet, and, after a staff decision Thursday, will carry the games on campus carrier current on the AM network.

Now, according to the station's ad manager Danny Ray, Radio Varsity has been approached by the Toro's advertising company, Vickers and Benson, to become the flagship radio station for a network of at least four Ontario radio stations in Ontario who want to pick up the Toros games. These stations will pick up the Varsity radio feed, which means that you can hear U of T's own Hunter and Michalak in such places as Oshawa, Peterborough, Richmond Hill and Brampton.

Subject to a positive decision by the Toros owners on the subject, the carrying of the Toros game would become a commercial proposition. Until now, Radio Varsity has paid no royalty rights to carry the Toros games, and in essence are doing the Toros a favor, since few other divisions of Toronto media, except the fledgling Global Communications will have anything to do with them.

The station presently carries no advertising during the games, but with a hookup to commercial stations in Ontario, the station would collect revenue from the pickup stations and would in turn have to pay royalty rights to the Toros and Vickers and Benson. It's probable that Radio Varsity will end up in the black on the deal.

"The big reason we wanted to carry the games in the first place," said Ray, "was to increase our audience within the city". Radio Varsity is carried in certain city areas network, which reaches about 150,000 people in Toronto.

Since learning of the offer, Ray said, Radio Varsity has been looked upon differently by other Metro cable companies. Graham Cable TV had refused to carry the station until this time, but now has changed its mind, contingent upon CRIC approval of the application. This too, means a wider audience, and a better shot at ad revenues.

One thing the station can't do is increase their campus hookups, due to budget problems.

All this upward mobility for the station follows a SAC-sponsored campaign during the summer and into the school year to have the Toros banned from the campus. SAC feels there is a critical lack of ice-time in the area, and that the Toros are taking time that could be better-used by campus or community groups.

The University of Toronto Athletic Association countered SAC's charges with a survey that showed little use of ice-time on Sunday night last year. This could be due to the price hike for Sunday nights, when the fee for an hour of ice-time rose from the normal $12.50 to $40 an hour.

The SAC campaign failed, while at the same time Radio Varsity was approaching the Toros for the radio rights. The station had to pay a small price on SAC budget night, when they were verbally reprimanded by SAC hacks. SAC vice-president Steve Moses even suggested that the approval of the station's $17,500 budget be contingent upon not broadcasting the games.

Moses said SAC was "pissed off" about the station's plans for the hookup.

"We recognize that editorial policy is and should be decided by the staff, however, we are pissed off that they are carrying the Toros games considering the campaign we waged this summer. We feel very strongly that the Toros are taking ice-time that could be used by the students and the community. The university shouldn't encourage mass-consumption corporate sports."

SAC communications commissioner Geoff Parker agreed with Moses' non-interference with the station's policy. He added that "SAC is trying to get the student's feeling as to whether Radio Varsity should continue broadcasting the Toros." SAC is soon to put out a ballot-sized questionnaire on campus to find some response. A similar Radio Varsity request for opinions got two replies.

Ray feels that SAC has been unjust in its disapproval.

"SAC formulates policy that is not always what the students want", he said, adding that in this case, SAC was "in the wrong."

Salaff wants Evans hearing

Stephen Salaff, a part-time mathematics instructor whose contract renewal was denied earlier this year, has asked university president John Evans to conduct a hearing into the denial.

"In circumstances which I believe are not in the best interests of the university and are moreover academically unethical," Salaff says in his letter to Evans, "the administration of the mathematics department refuses to permit me to continue my career as a teacher in the department."

"Regrettably, the division of extension has so far joined in denying me further employment."

Salaff's letter requesting the presidential review of the decision not to hire him was sent at the end of last week. It comes after a long battle Salaff has fought keep his job at the university.

Last March, students occupied the offices of the mathematics department protesting Salaff's case and the case of two mathematics professors denied tenure, Michael Mather and David Spring.

Following the occupation, Salaff attempted to appeal his case to Arts and Science dean Bob Greene, but the appeal was not allowed, Salaff said, because Greene said there were no grounds for appeal.

In his letter to Evans, Salaff described his attempt to appeal to dean Greene: "I wish to point out that I attempted to gain a hearing even before my contract expired by approaching the dean of arts and sciences."

"Although he refused, on grounds which I do not accept, information which was not then available to him further supports my present request," Salaff did not say what the information is.

While assistant or associate professors may appeal denial of tenure to the university president, part-time instructors are not allowed generally the right of appeal of denial of contract.

Salaff has said that he hopes his case can become a pivotal point for the issue of part-time instructors gaining the right of appeal.

A petition in circulation now in support of Salaff's case has brought about 75 faculty signatures. The petition addressed to Evans, says that "the right of appeal (is) a basic one for all university faculty members."

The petition explains some of the events leading to Salaff's dismissal. "He championed student rights in disputes with a departmental administration widely regarded as out of touch with its students in particular non-honors students."

"After differences of opinion on questions of grading and course content, he lost favor with this administration and was dismissed."

"In September 1973, the Division of Extension also rejected his application to continue teaching there. Stephen Salaff has never been given any grounds for his defacto expulsion from the university community, but instead the department has surrounded his case with undesirable secrecy."

Blasphemy! Cryin' the blues here, it's an interesting exercise trying to fill a paper that won't get filled. Pulling through this issue: Jill McKay, Andrew Faludy, Barry Weisleder, Keith Dewar, David Simmonds, Kidulian J.S. Simcoe Hall makes a sham of participation

University of Toronto president John Evans learns well from his old football friend, premier Bill Davis. Just as Davis and the Conservative government have held power through smokescreens and subtle manipulation, doctor John is constantly calculating to do the same. But, you might say, that's quite a black and white picture of our leader. Well let's let the facts speak for themselves.

Sociology students at the U of T and observers of the bureaucracies that abound within our society will recognize some of the familiar patterns in the university's administrative methods. Take for example, student participation in the governing structure of the university — a "sop to the masses" at best. Or take the constant references to the "decentralization of power with more decentralized decision-making". Just as the provincial Tory government has managed to rule with the old trick of "pretend to decentralize, but in fact centralize power", so the U of T is also learning the government game.

And who can better "streamline" the decision-making structures than the university's president, the statesman at the rudder? But power is also addictive, and the habit is now spreading throughout the administration, to Don Forster's office. Witness the recent Task Force on Academic Appointments which is allowing Forster to legitimize power into, ultimately, his own hands, where it, in fact, presently rests. But the Academic Appointments task force attempts to legitimize Forster's status and power within the Simcoe Hall bureaucratic labyrinth.

Even the students' old friend Jack Sword (of library bust fame) is maneuvering behind the scenes. Take for example, a recent planning and resources committee meeting, where Sword, vice-president of institutional relations and planning, sought to enhance the scope of his power. Sword indicated that "there was a need for his office to maintain close connections with both the central offices of the university and its various academic and non-academic divisions." As the planning and resources meeting's minutes stated "links had been established in the first area and mechanisms were required to assist in improving links with the local divisions also."

Sword "reported that his office now proposed to pay a part of the salaries of such officers in a few specified divisions in order to be able to call upon them for the use of some of their time in a two-way liaison function."

Finally, the planning and resources committee endorsed Sword's proposals, "noting the advantages of opening up channels of communication with the local divisions and of assisting them to share in the planning process". (We wonder whether the assistance was requested?)

Two years after the "new" U of T Act (1971) the farce of participatory government is evident (and it didn't take two years to discover this fact). At a time like this we're reminded of that old French expression, "Plus ça change, plus..."

Rolling Stone

Canada's "crisis" stems from dependence

Energy Minister Donald Macdonald has literally opened up the hornet's nest with his move last weekend to raise the export tax on crude oil shipments from 40 cents a barrel to $1.90. And as expected, Alberta premier Peter Lougheed quickly responded, promising an exclusively Alberta marketing board for liquid natural resources.

The seeds of the present crisis in policy were sown as far back as 1961 when Canada first decided under the "nationalistic" Diefenbaker regime that the country should have an oil policy. But, as time has shown, that policy has proven to be bankrupt.

The federal government also realized the present situation couldn't last much longer and began to act on the policy issues last summer with its "Green Paper" on energy. As Pollution Probe researcher Francois Bregha has revealed in The Varsity over the past few weeks, Canada is sitting on the fence. But what can be expected from a country that doesn't own its natural resources (not even the oil and gas found in Canadian territory)? How can a Canadian government, so closely aligned with multinational oil companies such as Gulf and Imperial Oil, hope to legislate policy to corporations which are practically countries unto themselves. For example Imperial Oil's chairman and chief executive officer, W.O. Twiste is, despite his title, not much more than a servant of the giant Esso corporation, with headquarters south of the Canadian border. Yet, he would perhaps fail to see the contradiction between serving an imperialist power and yet still remaining a Canadian citizen. But as I'm sure most of us have learned to appreciate by now, capitalism and especially imperialism, respects no borders.

How can Canadians fail to grasp the real effect the American "oil crisis" will have on this country with the possible oil shortages, gas rationing and price hikes everywhere? Have we become so attuned our dependent status that we must accept the standard answer: "well, in this world some countries will provide the resources so that others with superior technology can provide the goods?"

Macdonald likely will pay a high price for his bold gamble on the weekend, saying (as reported in the Globe and Mail) that the cabinet should seriously consider getting into the oil business by buying a company such as Gulf Oil or Shell. Surely the buy-back mentality has evaporated from this country by this time? What Macdonald fails to perceive is the necessity for total federal government control divorced from any foreign influences. Unfortunately Canada has long since passed the point of no return; we worry nervously and say that perhaps we should purchase back our own oil. And this can only happen in unclear Canada, "the true north strong and free".

James Bay death-knell sounded

Last week's Liberal party landslide in Quebec sealed the fate of the James Bay region. The Liberals will undoubtedly forge ahead more strongly than ever with their plans to turn one-quarter of Québec province into the largest hydro-electric project on the North American continent.

In today's centre spread feature we reveal the amazing lack of planning and myopic vision of the Liberal party. Bourassa's government is committing what amounts to a moral crime, a crime to all the people of Canada, not only to those in Québec. Six thousand Cree and Inuit native people will be forced to leave their adopted lands to make way for the newly-flooded territory. The ecological disaster that will result in that part of the province is predicted by Keith Dewar on pages six and seven.

Once again Québec is proving to be the same old "hewer of wood and drawer of water" however not for "les Anglaises" this time, but for the Americans instead. The energy grid, when completed, will supply enough energy to the American industrial northeast to alleviate any shortage of power until the advent of the nuclear generating axis expected in the 1980's. Québec will then be left with much more energy than it could conceivably use.

Pragmatic Liberal politics has led to the present dilemma and, unfortunately, the Parti Québécois, the only real opposition in last week's election, chose not to make the James Bay Development Corporation a major issue.

Unlike the current "crisis" of energy policy in Ottawa, Québec has seen fit to forge ahead with little study or debate on the James Bay issue, content with the fact that "the interests of the people" are being served. But we wonder which people, and whose interests?

Zionism is not nat'l liberation of Jewish people

"It has to be said harshly: The State of Israel was established at the expense of the Arabs — and in their place. We did not come into a void. There was an Arab settlement here. We are settling Jews in places where there were Arabs. We are turning an Arab land into a Jewish land." (Yediot Aharonot, May 10, 1973.)

These are the words of Moshe Dayan, Israeli Defense Minister. They reflect the conscious orientation of the state of Israel, of its historic architects, and of its current international collaborators.

The history of the Zionist state, and the world movement that helped give it birth, is an essential background to the internecine strife that currently pre-occupies life in the Middle East. The underlying causes of the recurrent Arab-Israel wars are to be found at least partly in that history, and act as guarantors of further bloodshed in that sector, whatever the machinations of the experts of 'detente' may produce.

Israel is unique among nations in so far as it was an idea before it was a state. Zionism, Israel's official ideology that is, the concept of the non-secular, homeland for all the Jews) was born in the wake of the Russian pogroms of 1882 and the tumult of the Dreyfus Affair.

The rapid capitalization of the Russian economy in the latter part of the 19th century made the lot of the Jewish populations in the small towns untenable. In the west, the middle classes, impoverished by capitalist concentration, vented their anger on the Jewish element whose competition worsened matters from their perspective.

The Jewish response began to form. In Russia, the association of the 'Lovers of Zion' was founded. Leo Pinsker's book, Auto-Emancipation, was produced, calling for a return to Palestine as the only hope for the Jews. In Paris, Baron Rothschild, reflecting the position of all the Jewish magnates of his time, frowned on the prospect of mass Jewish immigration to the western countries, fearing anti-semitism that this might help to generate, and became interested in Jewish colonization in Palestine. His more than generous material contributions to that end are to this day commemorated in Israel.

Theodor Herzl, a Jewish journalist from Budapest, witness to the anti-semitic demonstrations at Paris provoked by the Dreyfus affair, wrote The Jewish State, which remains the Bible of the Zionist movement.

In terms of its social base, Zionism, appeared from its inception, as a reaction of the Jewish petty bourgeoisie (which still forms the core of Judaism) subject to mounting anti-semitism, driven from one country to another, striving for the Promised Land to escape the crisis of modern society.

This Utopia cannot be found, however, in a world with a rising revolutionary dynamic. Implanted in third world Palestine, the Zionists concentrate Jewry's stand against that dynamic, and thereby jeopardize their own existence. How prophetic was Leon Trotsky's warning, issued some 35 years ago, that Palestine would prove to be a bloody death-trap for the Jews.

Zionist theoreticians like to compare

Zionism with all other national movements. Literature distributed this past week on U of T campus by Little Hillel House contends that "Zionism is the national liberation movement of the Jewish people". But in reality, the foundations of the national movements and that of Zionism are altogether different.

The rise of nationalism and the creation of a national state dates back only to the era of bourgeois revolution (mainly the 18th and 19th centuries) against the yoke of feudal particularism. The French Revolution of 1789 was typical of this movement. It was the consequence of capitalist development; it reflected the will of the bourgeoisie to create the national bases for production, to abolish feudal remnants.

This was the ascending phase of capitalism. And in this phase, far from being Zionist, the Jewish Bourgeoisie was profoundly assimilationist; the foundations were laid for its integration into the bourgeois nation.

Only as the process of 'nation-building' was approaching its end, the productive forces having had the opportunity to grow and then become constricted within national boundaries, did the expulsion of Jews from capitalist society begin in earnest with the rise of modern anti-semitism. Rather than being a product of the development of the productive forces, Zionism was the result of the halt of this development, its petrification. Not coming in the ascending period of capitalism, Zionism was the product of the imperialist epoch. The Jewish tragedy of the 20th century is a direct consequence of the decline of capitalism, and depends for its solution upon the smashing of that socio-economic order that has more than once resorted to playing the card of Jew-hatred to divert attention from its internal contradictions.

The resolution of these contradictions rests with the class struggle internationally. But Zionism rejects the class struggle road to Jewish liberation more than implicitly. Its content is racist for example, as Pinsker put it, anti-semitism is a "psychosis peculiar to the gentile") and situated in the Middle East, precludes the possibility of Arab-Jewish unity against imperialism. And so, Zionism intervenes against genuine self-determination by the Palestinians of all religious persuasions including the Sabras as effectively as the reactionary feudalist Islamic leaders did in the period of the British mandate, and as the Pan-Arabic chauvinists do today.

Having assumed their 'racial posture, and agreeing fundamentally with the fascist position that sees the 'objective necessity of Jewish emigration to Israel' 'where they belong', Zionists have chosen class sides. The imaginative contention that Israel represents the reclamation of a 2,000 year old legacy does not make Israel any less dependent for its existence upon imperialism (chiefly the American variety). What was in medieval times a religious yearning of the Jews for a return to 'holy Jerusalem' (rather than a thwarted nationalism) similar to that longing of Christians for heavenly reward, has in modern times been transformed by the will of imperialism into a device for the repression of the dynamic of permanent revolution in the Middle East.

Given the objective conditions of its origin, the Zionist enterprise could not but reflect the European colonial expansion of the 19th century, as it sought support in the West.

This 'destiny' was at least recognized in the writings of Herzl. In his The Jewish State, he patterned the 'Society of Jews' he wished to set up as the backbone of Jewish colonization on the model of the British chartered companies in Africa. The way he posed this in cultural terms is also revealing. Herzl wrote of Palestine: "We should there form a portion of the rampart of Europe against Asia, an outpost of civilization as opposed to barbarism." (Quoted from Mazine Rodinson, Israel and the Arabs, page 14, Penguin Books, 1970).

The determination to establish a Jewish state in an Arab land obviously had to clash, sooner or later, with the interests of the native population. This, too, was clear to the Zionists, despite their slogan, 'Palestine; a land without a people, for a people without a land.'

The high ideals of most of the early Jewish settlers could not prevent this state of affairs from evolving. Their 'socialism', seeking to avoid the consequences of colonialism and opposing the exploitation of the cheap Arab labour they were competing with, took the form of building a segregated economy, based on Jewish investments, exclusively Jewish labour, and inasmuch as feasible, exclusively Jewish produce. It was in this spirit that the exclusively Jewish trade union, the Histadrut, and the collective and cooperative rural settlements (kibbutzim and moshavim) were founded. These organizations, now fully part of the state apparatus, and in the case of the Histadrut, Israel's biggest employer, laid the 'national' basis for a society consisting of a Jewish bourgeoisie exploiting a Jewish proletariat (and super-exploiting the Sephardic or 'black-skinned' Jewish proletariat and female workers).

However, this 'exclusivist' policy had dramatic results for the Arab peasants, the 'fellahin'. It meant not only that they were evicted from the land they tilled after the Arab landowner had sold it to the Zionist concerns, but also that they were prevented on principle from finding employment on the Jewish farms or in industry. Likewise, the policy of boycotting Arab produce impeded the development of an Arab bourgeoisie and proletariat in Palestine.

Therefore Arab resentment to Zionist colonization could be channeled into neither bourgeois nationalism nor proletarian socialism, since the social classes that normally give expression to these ideologies remained embryonic owing to Zionist segregationism. Insead, the angry masses of Palestine fell prey to the greedy, obscurantist, feudal leadership that were selling out land to the Zionists at a handsome profit and thus preparing the eviction of their brethren.

And as the feudal leadership was thoroughly reactionary and leaned heavily on British support since the break-up of the Ottoman Empire, they diverted the Palestinian masses from their real interest — the struggle against imperialism and Zionist colonization — and initiated a chauvinistic, anti-Jewish campaign. Generally speaking, the current backward capitalist Arab regimes that surround Israel have not diverged from this practice, and are themselves critical allies to the status quo.

Nevertheless, for a Jewish state to exist, territory was required which could be controlled by well more than an absolute Jewish majority. This was what the Zionist project was all about. This was objectively what the British imperialists came behind in 1917 with the issuing of the Balfour Declaration (at a time when only 11% of the population of Palestine was Jewish). To this end, it was always clear that the expulsion of the Palestinians from their homeland was an operational imperative for the partners in colonization.

Even Herzl, who died in 1904, wrote in his Diaries of his intentions to 'spirit' the Arabs across the borders by closing off employment for them in Palestine. More explicitly was Joseph Weitz, the former head of the Jewish Agency's Colonization Department in Palestine, who wrote in his diary in 1940: "Between ourselves it must be clear that there is no room for both peoples together in this country . . . The only solution is Palestine, at least Western Palestine without Arabs . . . And there is no other way out but to transfer the Arabs from here to the neighbouring countries; to transfer all of them; not one village, not one tribe should be left . . . There is no other way out." (Quoted in International Socialist Review, Vol. 34, no. 6, p. 39).

Is it surprising that the Palestinians resisted this policy? Not any more surprising than the fact that the Palestinians fought the foreign domination by the Turks and British for consecutive generations.

And what was the attitude of the implanted Jewish community to the anti-imperialist Palestinian uprisings in 1929 and in 1936-39? It was to support the British, and for reasons that can only be described as opportunistic.

"The 1936 events actually involved a confrontation between two national movements, but the Arabs made the mistake of concentrating their attacks on the British government and army . . . This confrontation with the British (and not the Jews) caused the destruction of Arab military strength in Palestine, and was responsible for the partial elimination of Arab leadership in the country. After about three years of unequal warfare, Arab military power was destroyed; during this same period, however, the Jews, protected by the British, succeeded in building up their own strength . . ." (Quoted from "Palestine and the Jews", by Eli Lobel, essay in The Arab World and Israel, Monthly Review Press, 1970).

The exhausted Palestinian community was too weak to form its own state or to do anything about the events which followed the 1947 UN partition resolution (which was adopted when there were 1,280,000 Arabs in Palestine in a total population of 1,874,000).

Left with leadership like the reactionary British-imposed Mufti, and forced to flee from the terrorism of well-trained Zionist commandos, the Palestinians watched the land they were supposed to be allotted divided up between Israel and King Abdullah of Transjordan in 1949, from the vantage point of the squalid tent-cities they occupy to this day.

James Bay Project: Quebec still a 'drawer of water'

By KEITH DEWAR
adapted from the chevron

On April 29, 1971, against a background of stereo music and wide-angle screen play, Quebec premier Robert Bourassa informed Liberal party members of his government's multi-billion dollar scheme for a hydro-electric power development around James Bay. The plan, which had been under consideration since 1964, but had been rejected previously by the Quebec government as unnecessary, is to affect 144,000 square miles of land between latitudes 49 and 55, thereby covering one-quarter the area of Quebec province.

The actual area flooded will be immense (as shown below):

River system	Area flooded (square miles)
Nottaway	788
Broadback	344
Rupert	555
La Grande	2,437
Great Whale	35
Canliscau	905
Total	5,084

The total project will be divided into two sections, the more southerly being the Nottaway-Broadback-Rupert complex (NBR), and the more northerly the La Grande-Eastmain complex (see map). These are then broken down into reservoirs, each to be worked on as separate units. The generating stations are a second group of projects dependent upon the completion of the reservoirs.

The NBR calls for approximately 24 power stations and nine reservoirs, the Eastmain-La Grande calls for eight reservoirs and eight power sites. The total power to be produced by the project is conservatively estimated to be 17,545 megawatts (1 MW equals 1,000 kilowatts) with 5,845 from the NBR and 12,000 from the Eastmain-La Grande. The date for the first power flow is not yet known, but 1980 seems likely.

Jobs an election promise

Considering the large amount of media coverage, one is still left wondering about the extreme urgency of the Quebec Liberal government in implementing the plan. Bourassa's 1970 election promise of 100,000 jobs by the end of 1971 may have been one factor; he predicted the project will create between 125,000 and 135,000 jobs. (But while this many jobs might be produced on a temporary basis over 10 years, the James Bay project still will not solve the unemployment situation in the long run.)

A presentation made to the National Assembly by Hydro-Quebec indicates only 29,000 jobs will be created at the peak of construction in 1977. Furthermore, the Quebec office of planning and development, in an unpublished report, indicates that only 10,000 permanent jobs will be directly created. If they use the same kind of predictive mechanism as was used on the Churchill Falls Power Project, where they over-guessed nine to one, only about 1,000 jobs will be created. Using advanced "questimate" techniques it might be predicted that between 1,000 and 12,000 permanent jobs and between 29,000 and 135,000 temporary construction and service jobs will be created. Therefore, the carrot held out to the Quebec voter is the promise of an unknown number of jobs in northern Quebec.

A second possible reason for the rush would be to reverse the flow of capital out of the province. After the "October crisis" money began leaving Quebec at a more rapid rate and six billion dollars of investment would certainly help reverse the trend. Now, however, economists have raised fears that the influx of foreign capital will seriously weaken the Canadian dollar. The power produced would also hopefully attract new industry hence a second possibility to make more money.

Following the same line of reasoning, increased affluence and a decline in unemployment would strengthen the Liberal government's political position. The Parti Quebecois has continuously pressed the government and tended to make investors wary of coming political instability. Thirdly, Bourassa may have wanted to get the project well under way before an election. Fortunately for him the Parti Quebecois found other things to talk about in the recent election campaign.

Law suit and protection of rights

The federal government, always slow in dealing with Quebec, seemed to be playing right into the hands of the provincial government. Fears of the independence movement led the federal government to institute a hands off policy. But the policy seems to have failed miserably since the national political machine has been continually drawn into the affair.

On May 3, 1972, the Quebec Indian Association started action against the Quebec attorney-general, the two provincial agencies involved and the contractor already at work on the project, claiming the law creating the James Bay Development Corporation (JBDC) is unconstitutional. A second suit by the same organization called for an injunction against any further construction of the project. The suits were sparked by the fact that 6,000 Cree Indians might lose their traditional way of life and become almost totally dependent on welfare. Judgment on the case is still pending after the hearings wound up last July.

The federal government found itself involved when it learned that the department of Indian Affairs had been supplying money to begin the court case. Whether this was intentional or whether the government thought the money was going somewhere else, no one seems to know, or at least wants to say. The Indians have demanded that Jean Chretien and his department of Indian Affairs help protect native rights.

The transportation ministry may have to become involved as well, since the courses of certain rivers will be altered. Under the Navigable Waters Act the province must, in theory, receive permission from the federal department before diversions can take place.

Task force a joke

This project will be the first major test of Jack Davis' Department of the Environment. If he fails to do justice in this situation the department will more than likely become just another bureaucratic rubber stamp. And with the speed at which Quebec is going ahead with the project this seems to be exactly what is happening.

The department's recent white paper on environmental projects suggested that the James Bay scheme could never have been built had its recommendations been in force when the project was announced. The fact that the project is still going ahead does not speak well for the efforts of the Department of the Environment.

Furthermore, the federal-provincial task force report on the associated environmental problems is more of a joke than a scientific report. The $30,000 allotted to this project wouldn't pay the salaries of three good environmentalists, yet was intended to produce an ecologically accurate report on 144,000 square miles of relatively unexplored land. No environmental data whatsoever was gathered before the project was announced.

Unofficially, pressure has also been brought on Quebec to buy "Canadian". This pressure increased in the summer of 1972 with the announcement that Quebec had given a sizeable contract to an American firm to supply earth-moving equipment for road and dam construction. Also, the final engineering report was done by a New York firm; only contracts for road-building have been given to Canadian firms.

Escalating financial problems

Probably the two most pressing questions for Bourassa and the people of Quebec are how much the project will cost and where the money will come from to finance it. So far, neither of these questions has been answered satisfactorily.

Bourassa's original April (1971) announcement stated a cost of six billion dollars while the engineering firms hired to do a preliminary study estimated seven billion. More recently, the Financial Post and other sources indicated 10 billion would be more realistic, while the January-March (1972) issue of Nature Canada stated the NBR Complex will cost 4.1 billion dollars and the Eastmain-La Grande section seven to 10 billion, which adds up to a minimum of 11.1 billion and a maximum of 14.1 billion dollars. But these figures are nothing more than guesswork, since only preliminary feasibility studies have been carried out on the NBR complex, and until the summer of 1972 no real work had been done on the Eastmain-La Grande section.

Escalation of costs is common, so we can expect at least a one-third increase overall. Already the first several hundred miles of road from Matamagami to the Rupert River have exceeded estimates by $110,000 per mile and construction is not yet completed. The question of total cost will remain undetermined for some time.

Art equally nebulous question concerns financing. The James Bay Development Corporation, as a crown corporation, owns 50 per cent of the shares, Hydro-Quebec controls 40 per cent, while the remaining 10 per cent is unclaimed. It is hoped that Hydro's sale can be made to American and European investors, although attempts to obtain American capital have led one American financier to say, "We don't have a Alice-in-Wonderland ability to finance down here."

No large stock sales have yet been announced. Consolidated Edison of New York has purchased power, however, valued at $271 million over 20 years. This will erase a minor portion of the Quebec-Hydro debt, but will also insulate US debt payments against fluctuations in the US dollar.

Quebec-Hydro will build a $25 million line to the Canada-US border to transmit the power, and it has not been verified whether this cost was computed in the original estimate. Two generating units, producing 1,100 MW annually, will be set aside for the United States. The Americans will buy 1,440 MW over the first five years and an "additional 800 MW each year for 15 years if necessary" to keep the New York power grid active. So, over the next 20 years, Consolidated Edison will take approximately 13,440 MW of a possible 300,000 MW.

Dismal development

One reason no one is flocking to buy power from Quebec may be the cost. It has been estimated that it will cost between 7-11 mills to produce 1 kilowatt of power. (One mill equals one-tenth of one cent US.) At present the average cost is 5.5 mills. A study prepared for the Quebec government, and leaked to the press, indicates nuclear reactor thermal power on the same scale would cost no more than 8.5 mills per kilowatt hour. Thermal power from coal and natural gas would be in the same price range as nuclear power.

Also by 1980, fusion-operated nuclear devices may be developed. Their output per unit area would be several hundred times that of present fission generators, perhaps causing fewer environmental hazards and less expense in fuel and heavy water requirements.

Talk of pulp and paper operations has been used to dim a financial picture. In it looms the possibility of cutting from the flooded areas. And Laval University's Forestry Research Institute has stated that so much timber would "flood the market", that source of income, particularly in areas where unemployment is high.

Ecological and environmental

The problem revolving coverage, and stirring up criticism, has to do with the environment. The act creating the task force states that the environment and yet the rest of the bill complete environmental quality and success of the bill, laws or acts concerning development. Bill 50 gives the "promote the development of harnessing of natural resources territory lying between the fifty-fifth parallels". No mention of a serious obligation by the province.

The whole tone of Bill 50 is Section 42, which indicates provincial laws respecting resources do not apply where in conflict with the bill. Elsewhere powers of expropriation are mentioned, and no provincial sanction the Quebec government see creating a small empire under JBDC. (It looks almost like the Hudson's Bay Company by the end of the 1600's.)

Although the idea of development has been under consideration, work was done on the ecological project until three months after announced. Only then was the provincial task force set up. The task force were told that strains their work was to be existing sources rather than result, the report reads like record: "...not enough time..."

In the introduction the states, "because of the time on the production of the report force wishes to note that it may value judgments to which it reservedly subscribe." Taken taken to mean that due to lack of information, the report is a guess on which no two states. Certainly money was a problem too little to do a study mile area on which existing are almost non-existent.

Cumulative effect

The results of this study note some interesting findings climatologists vary in their opinion as to what will happen to the weather. Also, actual volume of water will be more than a very local effect, but back from James Bay in the greater importance, since the depends on fresh water circulation and stir up nutrients from enough fresh water comes in, may be delayed in parts and the Maritimes.

Scientists are also very much concerned with the cumulative effect of increased hydro electric power sites on Bay and Hudson's Bay. If too much back or diverted, longer winter temperatures could inevitably be affected.

Although the possibility remains remote, some geological additional weight of water on the tectonic movements in the earth to establish themselves at stratigraphic levels, either draining or resulting in an empty reservoir.

The river estuaries will be affected. The change in temperature generally cause changes in the water. This will in turn change the composition of the micro-organisms, change in fish and bird life. Scientists continue to say that dynamic equilibrium will be whether this will be beneficial to the flora and fauna cannot be predicted.

'Drawdown' and wildlife

The fish and wildlife of the area will be seriously affected. For example, the Canadian government has been several months trying to hold a national conference on Stockholm in June, 1972, is spawning grounds destroyed.

Furthermore, whitefish, arctic char and northern pike are greatly reduced in number.

water spawners with their eggs remaining in shallow water for the entire winter. The first four of these species are commercially marketable, while the last is one of the most sought after game fish in eastern Canada.

As the "drawdown" process occurs a problem arises when the huge reservoirs and upstream areas begin losing water during the winter. As the water level drops, the eggs, layed in shallow water of less than 20 feet, are exposed and freeze, killing the next generation of fish. Nine of the 15 rivers in the proposed development have a drawdown of a least 20 feet.

The fish are an especially valuable source of income for the native people, who also receive one to 13 per cent of their protein from fish. Moreover, many birds, otter, fisher, and other fur-bearers depend in part on fish as a food source.

Wildlife may also be in real danger. Beaver and otter will have their homes exposed to predation while their young are in the den, and fishers, martens and wolves will have their hunting territories reduced. All these animals are fur-bearers providing up to 60 per cent of the income of Indians in the area. Moose, caribou, and beaver are a valuable food resource accounting for up to 70 per cent of the protein in the Indian's diet, while yielding additional income through trapping and guiding.

Decreasing the number of small ponds and the actual footage of shore line will remove both moose and beaver habitats. Many ducks also use the area for a staging ground as well as for nesting; they too will have their habitat reduced. In addition, blue geese, snow geese, and several types of ducks that are declining alarmingly will

The most significant element in the area is the 6,000 Creole Indians. Although arguments have arisen as to how the development will affect them, the fact that the Indians are taking the matter to court certainly indicates their apprehensiveness and discontent.

The task force feels the Indians are more dependent on welfare than many people realize. In many parts of Canada the welfare system has completely destroyed the Indians' positive self-image. The result has been extremely high rates of alcoholism, a slow form of suicide to many Indians. Crime rates and general psychiatric disorders are also common, all made worse by the fact that medical and social care are almost non-existent.

This social problem is almost certain to exit in the James Bay area. First, the project will destroy trap lines two and three centuries old; new ones will be made available but won't be as good. Many trappers might opt for welfare rather than attempt the difficult task of re-establishing a line in an unknown area. Indian villages centuries old will ultimately be displaced and new ones established at sites chosen by the government.

Furthermore, the influx of tourists and rapid development may lead to great problems in which the Indians will again find themselves second-class citizens exploited as cheap labor. The claim by the JBDC that the Indian is offered a choice of maintaining traditional patterns of joining the project is clearly a choice between sinking or swimming—in effect, no real choice at all.

It is also apparent that neither the federal or provincial governments are willing to do much about the situation. Premier Bourassa has said only that "the Indians will not be an obstacle to the development of James Bay." Pierre Nadeau, past president of the JBDC, said, "when you consider the thing coolly, without emotion, you must conclude that it is possible to develop the natural resources of this region for the economic benefit of all Quebec, and the common good of all Quebecers without any harm to Indian privileges."

As a result of public pressure the Bourassa government has generally retreated from the originally proposed development scheme. The decision to develop the NBR has been overturned in favour of beginning with the more northerly Eastmain—la Grande section. For the time being, therefore, a great deal of the wildlife and forest reserves will be saved. The Indians will not be affected as much since most live along the southern sections, which may not be developed as part of the project after all.

Pierre Nadeau resigned as chairman of JBDC, indicating a take-over move by Hydro-Quebec, which now controls the project. Hydro-Quebec has offered to provide the 'financial muscle' in order to assure the completion of the project.

Reactions to the newer scheme remain unchanged. Although the area is not as ecologically valuable, Dr. John Spence of McGill University has said. "It (the new project) will be devastating for the community of Fort George...little is known about the country north of La Grande."

As for the Indians, the Cree say they will not accept the James Bay project as presented. They have been asking for a down-scaling of the development in such a way that their bush will be safeguarded and they want continuing consultation plus a share in project decision-making.

Financially, the development costs continue to rise. The present plan, although it will produce about half as much power, now costs as much as the original one. These costs may escalate further since the La Grande basin has not yet been studied in detail.

Gays pass five-point program for equality

An ambitious five-pronged program to increase the rights of gay people was passed at a weekend conference Saturday of the Gay Alliance Toward Equality (GATE).

The efforts of the U of T group, outlined in a series of resolutions, are to encompass a range of activities from getting changes in the university discipline code to participating in national coalition to pressure federal candidates for parliament.

The five areas outlined are federal provincial, high school, campus and media.

In the federal sphere, a resolution was passed which continues GATE's participation in the National Gay Election Coalition, which GATE spokesman Ken Popert says will mean GATE will attend candidates meetings and lobby candidates to push for pro-gay positions.

Popert says the coalition will also be presenting briefs to the federal Law Reform Commission and the immigration department, which has called on public groups to submit briefs suggesting ideas for a new immigration act. The current act prohibits immigration by gay people.

Provincially, GATE has backed off from direct lobbying of Queen's Park legislators. The resolution passed Saturday calls for the group to go to the Ontario Human Rights Commission to pressure the commission into setting up a study group to document the nature and extent of discrimination against gay people.

Popert says the commission has been officially sympathetic but uncooperative in the past.

The provincial angle is a follow-up of last month's move by Toronto

City Council, when council passed a resolution forbidding discrimination in city hiring based on sexual orientation after a pressure campaign by GATE.

On campus, GATE wants to write into the new university discipline code a clause stating that there should be no discrimination based on sexual orientation, one resolution says.

Popert says his group will also be approaching the law school with two thoughts in mind, to get legal assistance from sympathetic law students and to try to inform law students of some of the discrimination gay people experience at the hands of some courts and some lawyers.

Popert also says the group wants to get involved in the issue of university employees being fired possibly on a discriminatory basis for being gay.

GATE will also be approaching Metro school boards, according to another resolution, to try to get them to allow gay speakers to appear in high schools.

Popert said that North York has it in writing that no gay speakers are allowed and other school boards make it an unofficial policy.

GATE's program to tackle this problem consists of going to both the school boards involved and also writing to the various high school departments.

The last area to be covered is what Popert calls a "virtual news blackout on gay news" by the three Toronto dailies.

One resolution which drew heated discussion but was rejected almost unanimously, Popert said, was a move to have GATE restrict its effort to men's problems only. That rejection simply re-affirmed GATE's policy of dealing with both men and women, Popert said.

Nuclear power means waste

By JILL MACKAY

With plans in operation for a joint network of three nuclear power plants to feed Toronto's future energy requirements many people, among them U of T's Dr. Arthur Porter, are worried about the energy wastage that this will involve.

Joining those from the plant at Pickering will be lines from the nuclear reactors being built at Douglas Point, 180 miles west of Toronto on Lake Huron, and at Nanticoke, 100 miles southwest of Toronto on Lake Erie. These will converge at Georgetown to feed the Golden Horseshoe area.

Porter's concern is that, at best, about 50 per cent of the energy from these plants will be lost through wastage because of the inefficiency inherent in a system which uses steam generators.

All forms of matter tend towards entropy or complete randomization and likewise energy released into the air or the water is dispersed and lost to us forever, the professor at the Institute of Environmental Sciences and Engineering says.

If, however, the excess energy which cannot be converted into hydro is harnessed and kept within a cycle of productivity, he says, not only is waste avoided but the inevitable damage to the environment is minimized.

When heat energy is released into the air for a period of years it may actually alter the environment in ways which nature is unable to support, he says.

The prospect of an ecological upset in the Great Lakes has already been viewed at Pickering. According to Dr. Porter, in some areas of the United States temperatures of rivers may be raised by as much as eight degrees by the year 2000 if indiscriminate water runoff from the nuclear power plants is allowed to continue.

Looking ahead to the day when the known sources of power have been exhausted, experts are working on a new method which has a virtually infinite supply of raw materials.

One source of power in the future, says Dr. Porter, will be nuclear fusion where vast amounts of energy are released upon the joining of two atomic nuclei.

Even now, man could not exist without fusion for it is occurring continually in the sun creating its heat and light, Porter says. The technological problems of containing and controlling our own mini-suns are staggering and will probably not be resolved within our lifetime, he added.

The process requires temperatures of up to 40 million degrees Kelvin in order to take place. Then fusion must be triggered off with the use of laser beams or something similar, said Porter.

The Russians, the furthest advanced in this field, have had their system going for one thousandth of a second, Porter says.

Present nuclear power plants use uranium or some other fissionable element whose atoms split in two emitting large quantities of heat in the process.

The products of fission are usually radioactive and therefore potentially deadly for up to 20 or 30 years thus presenting a massive storage problem in the meantime.

Fusion is not radioactive however it often involves tritium, a heavier form of hydrogen, as one of its components and this toxic gas will somehow have to be contained.

Reader dissects editorial

With each succeeding editorial you serve to widen the credibility gap and insult your readers' intelligence. If the position you are attempting to assume has a leg to stand on, it ought to be arrived at by more than transparent and inept word juggling and contortions and distortions of logic.

On Friday, 12 October, you direct your dull pen, or is it dull wit, toward the United Way — an organization which may well deserve reappraisal, perhaps even castigation. But do you clarify the issue?

The column begins jejune enough with an effort to belittle Dr. John Evans upon an issue, his endorsement of the UW, only obliquely germane to the body of the editorial. By paragraph four, the "basic minimum" of paragraph two is distorted to "bar minimum" which is then followed by a couple of fatuous rhetorical observations so blatantly vague that, I can't help but say it, the mind boggles.

After softening our brains with your semantic dexterity, you introduce Citizens Concerned About Social Policy (CCASP) without so much as a clue to the validity of their credentials. Oh? you say you said it all when you tagged CCASP as a "well-researched group of young social welfare workers?" No, I'm afraid that was no more convincing than the tap dance you thought you were doing on Dr. John's windpipe.

Well, excelsior CCASP has damning evidence! Oh boy, now we're into it at last. "An interlock in the Board of Directors" must be significant, so I'll let my imagination supply the details. Ah! better yet "a very small percentage! What I can't do with that doesn't deserve mention 'Overhead costs!' O fabulous day! Callooh! Callay!

Now mired waist deep in muddy rhetoric, a coherent line drifts by at the end of paragraph 9, but the reader is struggling with indecision, wondering where the barb has been hidden or is this truly an intelligible statement meant to be seriously considered.

The scene suddenly shifts to an encounter group of corporate executives in shirt sleeves, out among the needy and the poor where they are earnestly, but misguided, re-enforcing "the basic premises of the liberal-democratic system." And hypocritical bastards that they are, our fearless editor sees self-interest graven on their hearts, a sin (?) of which we have shivered ourselves.

Now, nearly two-thirds of the way through the diatribe, a saner tone enters. And yet the occasional reversion to hysteria occurs. And the loaded adjectives, so much a part of your vocabulary, harken us back to your initial efforts. By the time the tag line rolls around, the reader, as exhausted as was the writer, hardly blinks at the tired cliché "corporate rip-off" is tacked to the battered body of John Evans — Oh no! The editorial was about the United Way. Sorry, I got confused.

"My object holds sublime" though with one hand I don't expect to right The Varsity, I do hope to provide an indication that verbal exhibitionism will not "snow" everyone. More importantly, will it snow anyone? It is my considered opinion that you do yourselves, your beliefs, your causes, and, worst of all, your readers more damage than possible good. An irreparable case for a responsible cause cannot but serve to impeach the credibility of that cause — and that is what your efforts are doing for the case against the United Way. If change or superannuation overtakes the United Way, it will most likely be in spite of, not because of, your efforts.

Invincible Israel myth exploded

Soberly considered, there are two things which the recent war in the Middle East has proved. First of all, the balance of forces has definitely shifted, and Israel's army is now quite clearly incapable of having everything its own way. Secondly, it is this development which accounts for any movement towards a long-term settlement which we may witness now, so that it clearly is the strength of the Arab side on which chances for a lasting peace depend. That, if more evidence were necessary, should disprove the Zionist assertion that Israel has been battling for its survival all these years.

And so, the myth of Israeli invincibility is exploded. The more or less racist conception of Arabs as stupid peasants unable to fight has been definitely refuted in real life. And in any future confrontations the balance of forces can only continue to shift still further. The ability of US imperialism to back up its satellites anywhere on the globe can only continue to decline. The ability of the Soviet Union and other socialist states to render effective assistance to the cause of national liberation in the Third World can only continue to grow. And this may help, either now or later, to put the Israeli government in a more reasonable frame of mind than it has been in until now regarding the Arab territories which were grabbed by Israeli aggression in June, 1967.

The settlement terms now being discussed are, of course, essentially those proposed by Egypt at least as far back as May, 1968 (Le Monde, May 11, 1968)—namely, withdrawal of Israel from the occupied territories, guarantee of sovereignty and territorial inviolability of all the states in the area, including the Arab states as well as Israel, freedom of Israeli sea passage through the Suez Canal and the Strait of Tiran, demilitarized zones on the frontier, and a just settlement of the problem of the more than one million Arab refugees—all this to be guaranteed by the UN Security Council, in accordance with its resolution of November 22, 1967.

Israel has consistently rejected these terms (e.g., New York Times, May 18, 1968), and any movement towards settlement along such lines now can only be attributed to the dawning realization, prompted by the recent war, that in the long run the military superiority of the Arab side is a certainty.

Any setback for Israeli aggression is necessarily also a setback for the Western imperialists, the US and Great Britain in particular, who have long benefited from the effect that Israel's aggressive role in the Middle East has had of compelling a diversion of the Arab class struggle sufficient to keep most of the area's oil production safe in the control of "friendly" feudal princelings.

On the other hand, any such setback for the imperialist oil companies must clearly be a gain for mankind.

SAC is pink, Varsity yellow

I found your recent article, Hart House Goes Pink, to be a perfect attitude of the unrepresentative posture of SAC and all its organs.

I can see that SAC has the right to ask the Hart House Chorus to sing at SAC or Arts and Science Student Union gatherings. However, I question their right to force the Chorus to sing the Communist anthem, the Internationale, at one on- and one off-campus concert. Obliging a body of this nature to sing or do something is as much censorship as forbidding them to do it.

This whole affair also brings to mind another, related, question. Since when is SAC an organ of the Communist Party? While most of the members of SAC, The Varsity and other groups in SAC seem to lean to the left, I know that most of the students at Scarborough College don't seem to. Neither do I believe that the majority of students in U of T do so. Is this how SAC represents the students of our university? While I don't begrudge individual members of SAC or writers for The Varsity their political views, I do not like to see the student newspaper become a forum for the blatantly biased, yellow journalism that appears in every issue. I don't even mind if articles of this nature are included, if the opposing view is given along side of it, with equal length, and not in the next issue, when people's prejudices have already been formed.

A good example of the latter opinion is a recent article in Varsity, reviewing the beginning of the latest Arab-Israeli War from a pro-Arab viewpoint. No article has appeared yet, with a reply from the Israeli point of view. Instead, a letter was reprinted in Write On! If this is the sort of highbrow journalism to be expected from Varsity, then its editors should cease to represent the paper as an impartial voice of the students.

The gist of my remarks is that SAC and Varsity in particular do not, or may not, represent the actual opinions of U of T students. Neither does it provide them with balanced, factual information about current events which Varsity wishes to bring to our attention. Varsity has been in the past, and still is, too much of a platform for its one-sided editorial staff to wave their own flag.

Set up alternate discipline code

According to the McGill Daily last week, students of the University of Toronto face a "tough disciplinary code" approved before any student protest could be organized. Realizing how important responsible protest can be, it is distressing to learn of such a measure coming into being.

I suggest that if this measure, which denies both the maturation of the individual and the integrity of the institution, is not revoked and alternate code be set up to protect both the mature scholar and the undergraduate student. Education applied at any level entails a reversible interaction between two phenomena. A lapse of responsibility on either side involves a change of mutual respect and hence a "disciplinary problem." A code defined by an authorizing body, whether student, professorial, or administrative — no matter how benign — must ensure that the responsible interaction suggested above be fostered at all costs. This must involve on one hand the protest by students of unequal sharing of common property (a privileged graduate library) and on the other hand disciplinary action against students for willful damage incurred in violent demonstration. A code involving an ultimate consequence must by its very presence demand an alternate code of preservation. While a student of Trinity College (1964-67), I recall that responsible student protest was the only viable "alternate" code, thereby ensuring student participation in the educational process.

I urge that support be withdrawn from a body of individuals who deem it necessary to authorize absolute control over responsible protest.

Morgentaler: abortions medically necessary

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Morgentaler trial took a positive turn for the defense when Judge James Hugesen agreed to accept Article 45 of the Criminal Code as a valid basis for the defense. Under this article, Dr. Henry Morgentaler may contend that he is entitled to immunity from criminal responsibility on the grounds that it was medically necessary for his patient's physical and psychological health that he perform the abortion for which he is on trial.

Morgentaler is facing the first of six charges for performing illegal abortions. The crown is basing its case on a specific abortion performed in his clinic August 15, the day the Montreal Police raided his clinic and seized his files. One of his patients on that day is the main witness for the prosecution.

She is an unmarried, twenty-six year-old foreign graduate student in the Montreal area who testified that she needed the abortion because neither she nor the father-to-be could afford to support the child. Also, she did not want the public shame that accompanies an unwed mother and illegitimate child.

Two of the Montreal hospitals she contacted for an abortion asked for "fantastic sums" and the other two could not give her an appointment soon enough. Morgentaler had been recommended by a staff member in one of the hospitals.

The defense is now trying to establish the necessity of that abortion.

The first witness called for the defense was Dr. Bourne, head of the Maisonneuve hospital in Montreal. He admitted having referred women to Morgentaler for abortions on the grounds that if they were determined to have abortions then they would be best treated by Morgentaler. He maintained that Morgentaler was the best in his field.

When presented with a "hypothetical situation" by the prosecution, the details of which corresponded exactly with the present case, Bourne said that he would have recommended the woman for an abortion.

Dr. Maurice Jobin, a doctor who has been actively fighting for the repeal of the present abortion laws, testified that many doctors refer women to Morgentaler for abortions. Furthermore, the majority of the abortions performed at the Montreal General Hospital are accepted because of conditions in the women similar to those described by the prosecution witness.

The registrar of the Quebec College of Physicians and Surgeons, Dr. Augustin Roy, described Morgentaler as a member in Good standing.

No major complaints had been made about him. Once again, the prosecution presented the "hypothetical case" and Roy agreed that he would have referred the woman for an abortion. He added that he had received a letter from Morgentaler inviting him to come to inspect the clinic in preparation for legal approval of the clinic. However, because of the trial, they had to postpone the inspection.

The long term consequences of not aborting a woman who wishes it are often very damaging, including psychosis and the possibilities of suicide, according to Dr. MacKay, a psychiatrist and director of professional services at L'Hopital Riviere Des Prairies in Montreal. The effects on a child that a woman has been forced to bear are also severe, the doctor testified.

Morgentaler began his testimony on Wednesday as the last witness for the defense. He stated that he had performed between 6,000 and 7,000 abortions in the past few years in his clinic.

In the present case he considered the abortion "necessary and indispensable". He felt that if he had not performed the abortion the woman would have sought "a charlatan or attempted self-abortion."

"I decided that it was in the interest of her health to do it," he said.

The results of questionnaire that Morgentaler sent to doctors and organizations who had referred women to his clinic showed that only women out of more than 5,000 had developed complications.

He first began performing abortions in late 1968, he said. "Once having made the decision to do so, I was determined that none should be refused for financial reasons."

In the present case the woman testified that she had been told that the price would be $200. However, she told him she had only $80. He reduced the fee to $150 and offered to accept a post-dated cheque for the remainder.

"I only did my duty," he said, and added that he did not have "the least regret" about having performed the abortion.

Halifax survey: half of pregnancies unwanted

HALIFAX (CUP) — Nearly half of 196 pregnant women surveyed at the time of delivery in a Halifax hospital told researchers they had not wanted to have a baby.

The research study, conducted by Dalhousie University's department of obstetrics and gynaecology, shows that 87 (44 per cent) of 196 pregnancies were reported to be unwanted initially by the women.

Although there was a high rate of conversion to wanting the baby at the time of delivery or just after delivery, 18 babies (nine per cent) of the 196 were reported to be still unwanted after delivery. Six per cent of the children were given up to agencies.

The study says that the unwanted pregnancy is "apparently not preventable by our present approach to sex education and family planning, and throws a large burden of unwanted children on the community."

A summary of the study's contents is published in the current newsletter of the Family Planning Federation of Canada.

The newsletter summary notes that "the majority occurred in well-educated married women having their first or second baby, and in spite of adequate access to contraceptive material."

A statistical projection of the results indicates that of the approximately 3,200 pregnancies in the hospital surveyed, every year 1,500 would still be initially unwanted and 300 would still be unwanted after delivery. Of the 300 babies still unwanted after delivery, 100 would be taken home, while 200 would be given up for adoption.

The study reports that even with

Free phones cost money

Almost a year ago Bell Canada sent out a blurb with the phone bills to its Toronto customers offering a deal: a lot of people simply could not afford to turn down—a free extension phone installed at no extra charge.

Thousands scrambled to get the deal, apparently figuring that for once Ma Bell was being generous.

Now the phone company wants to raise residential phone rates 60 cents a month to make the monthly minimum $7 because the number of telephones and extensions in Toronto has shown a dramatic increase.

The increase application will probably get automatic approval from the Canadian Transport Commission because local rates are based on the number of telephones and extensions in a local calling area.

the marked decrease in births in Nova Scotia from 1965 to 1970, the total population increase was 40,000, or five per cent. With a net emigration of 4,000 per year, the actual increase in numbers of people was 20,000 or two and a half per cent.

The Dalhousie study was done by Sharon Stone, R.N., with Dr. Kenneth Scott of Halifax in 1971.

Stone is currently preparing the survey for publication in a Canadian medical journal. She says that the study shows trends like those found in England, and sees a need for more research on unwanted pregnancies.

Varsity reels in McMaster Marlin's

By DOUG KELK

Pundits predicting the demise of Blues as the premier intercollegiate hockey team received a setback Saturday when Varsity displayed the punch of years past, crushing McMaster Marlin's 7-1.

In a first period marked by close checking and unclicking passes by both sides, the Blues dominated the play, outshooting the competition 24-4. Kent Ruhnke scored the lone marker.

However, as Varsity was able to score only once in a period in which they had a man advantage four times, there was still doubt about the outcome of the game.

The Blues came out flying in the second period and thoroughly took charge. A crowd of 70 predominantly McMaster fans became so noticeably subdued that the sounds of nearby construction competed for attention with the antics of Marlin's goalie, who steered away all but three of 24 shots on goal.

Varsity's marksmen were Ron

Harris, Bill Hews and Don Pagnutti. Marlin's lone goal late in the period inspired some enthusiasm from the fans but the home team flared for only a few minutes before being overpowered again.

The Varsity team's ferocious forechecking throughout the game was rewarded with good scoring opportunities. What the juniors lacked in experience, they compensated for in hustle. Bill Hews shone as the most effective rookie on the ice, scoring two goals and an assist.

The final period saw Marlin's show strength for the first four minutes, with as many scoring opportunities in that time as they had in the first two periods combined.

Blues' superiority was confirmed again however at the 4:09 mark when Chuck Luksa scored, soon followed by Bill Hews and John Richmond. A weary McMaster team battled the Varsity onslaught until the final buzzer. Judging from this game, the Queen's Cup seems to be safe yet.

Battle looms at Guelph

GUELPH (CUP) — The University of Guelph University Centre, presently under construction, may be halted if the administration does not allow students substantial control over the building.

The student council executive said Friday that, if students are not allowed more control over the building than they presently exercise, their funds will be withdrawn and a referendum will be held on whether the centre should be completed.

Students have contributed over $2.5 million towards the costs of the $6.7 million building. The funds were approved for the construction of a student union building by referendum in 1966.

But the building has changed since then, and a further referendum approved changes after provincial grant structures changed.

Harries sweep OUAA

By JIM MAYDO

The Varsity cross country team continued its domination of the QUAA cross country championships with a run-away team victory at the University of Western Ontario on Saturday. Toronto runners placed 2, 3, 4, 9, and 10 to win the championship low score total with 28 points, followed distantly by York University with 97 points and the University of Guelph with 109 points. Joe Sax lead the winning Toronto team with a time of 31:18 over the soggy 10,000 meter course, run in chilly 35 degree weather at the Western campus. He was closely followed by pre-race favorite John Sharp, who ran the last five miles of the race with only one shoe.

Mike Dyon ran a strong race to finish fourth and outdistance all other freshmen in the race. Greg Lockhart and Brad Morley rounded out the team score with ninth and tenth places respectively.

Freshmen John Curtin and John Hiley placed twelfth and twenty-third in the field of seventy-five runners and show great promise for the Varsity team which will defend its title again next year.

Results of Saturday's race have placed Joe Sax, John Sharp and Mike Dyon on the seven-man team which will represent the Ontario universities in the Canadian championships in Saskatoon on November 10. That will be accompanied by Andy Higgins, head track and cross country coach at the U. of T., who was selected to coach the Ontario team in Saskatoon.

Field hockey wins OWIAA laurels

The Varsity - Sue Scott

By DAINA ZUKAUSKAS

OWIAA field hockey competition ended last weekend, with Blues retaining their championship title for the 12th year in a row. U. of Guelph was the scene of the last stage of the tournament, with its inclement weather and numerous injuries.

Toronto was ahead with 6 points when the weekend started, while McGill and Waterloo were close behind with 5 points apiece.

Friday's first game for Toronto was against Western. Blues have the same problem as many teams — playing just above the calibre of the opposition in order to win. Thus, TO's first goal was a long time in coming.

Just before halftime, right wing Sally Dakin drilled in a goal on a long drive from the edge of the circle. On the next play down the pitch centre forward Dynnab Prentice broke through Western's defence to put in goal number two. The second half was scoreless — final result 2-0.

Toronto's next game, played on a soggy pitch in cold driving rain accompanied by thunder, was crucial. McGill had no intentions of losing. The game was wide open, fast and swinging in spite of the elements. McGill would clear the ball to their offensive end, where Toronto fullbacks, Sue Scott and Chris Crawford, would pick it up and try to get it back to their own forwards.

At first McGill picked off most passes, keeping Blues' defence under constant pressure. When Toronto's forwards did get the ball, it was a struggle to get it up the field. McGill seemed to have the upper hand, while Blues played steadily.

Toronto's perseverance finally paid off. Blues had the ball in the circle, the forwards rushing shots cleared by McGill's goalkeeper. The slippery mud proved to our advantage, as Prentice slid the ball into the net past McGill's stumbling defence. McGill immediately pressured back for a goal of their own, but the half ended Toronto 1, McGill 0.

Chilled by the rain at halftime, Blues were slow to get moving again. Left half Leslie McIntosh, was forced to leave the game because of a sore knee and Debbie Wilson replaced her.

The second half was as tense as the first. McGill had many breakaways (on long clearing drives up the field) which left the halfbacks running to catch up while Toronto's fullbacks tried to get the ball out of their end. Toronto's forwards seemed confronted by a solid defence. The few holes were hard to take advantage of as the ball stopped in puddles and stuck in the mud.

Neither team managed a goal in the second half, and the half-time score stood as the final result.

Friday's games left the team standings relatively unchanged. Toronto was ahead with 10 points. McGill and Waterloo were still tied at 7 points each.

Saturday the rain was gone but it was cold as Toronto confronted Guelph. The game proved no contest as Blues put in 4 goals. Pam Dunbar (right wing) tipped in the first goal on a cross from left wing Barb Richardson.

Prentice successfully out-manoeuvred Guelph on a penalty bully, and Pat Williams (right inner) smashed in a drive on a penalty corner. Prentice scored a fourth time on a breakaway, flipping the ball to the far side of the net.

The 4-0 win put Toronto in an unbeatable position with 12 points. The OWIAA title was ours, with only one game to go against Waterloo. The game didn't mean much to Toronto as by standings went, but it was a matter of pride to finish the tournament unbeaten. Also, Waterloo needed points for second place over McGill.

The game was at times open and swinging, but often got bogged down on one side or the other as Waterloo's defence stymied Blues' attempts to cross the ball.

In the circle, Blues rushed well but couldn't get the ball past the many feet into the goal. The halfbacks watched from the top of the circle as, time and time again, a free ball sitting near the goal line was swiped at and missed by a frustrated forward. The mucky footing didn't help. Finally Prentice scooped the ball into the net to put Toronto ahead 1-0.

Waterloo had to wait until the second half before they scored on a drive from the top of the circle. When Blues returned the ball to their offensive end, Pat Williams wrenched a sore knee in a rush on goal and had to be replaced. Blues couldn't manage to pull together for another goal and the final result was a tie, 1-1.

Coach Nancy Gossling was happy with the overall result and the team was glad to make her last year at U of T a championship one.

The intermediates also played as defending champs, and held their title on the weekend, in spite of the considerable confusion and lack of scoring they demonstrated earlier in the season.

Final intermediate standings were: Toronto 15, Queen's 10, Laurentian 8, McMaster 6, Ottawa 1.

Vic drops to second in soccer and lacrosse

Two postponed games between Eng and Erin will decide the final standings in first division, soccer. St. Mike's is definitely fourth, and Vic either second or third.

Vic lost its league lead with the bad weather late in the regular season. So scored the lone marker to give Erindale a 1-0 home win against them, and Eng finished their season with a 4-1 shellacking on Friday (Coolman 2, Bouris, Kirk vs Pike). Earlier the Vic men hit Scar 1-0 on Williams' rainy-day volley and then the mikes 3-1 (Regan 2, Pike; Brandimarte).

Bouris took time from rugby to score as Eng shut out Scar 1-0. Scar rebounded to upend UC 6-0 on Morra (hat), Vessio (pair) and Gough. Eng also laced UC 7-0 (Kirk 3, Bouris Kozak, Christopoulos, Rosa). Li, Lewitsky, Sitaki all escaped from the cloth factory to lead Erin 3-0 over UC. Exit UC.

SMC firmly ensconced itself in fourth by forfeiting to Scar and bowing 3-0 to Erin (So, Ngan, Inserro).

Final standings in the second division found Meds and Jr. Eng tied for first, with the doctors getting the top place on their earlier win over the plumbers. PHE came third and Trinity A fourth. The doctors meet Trins and the jocks the plumbers in the semis.

Meds (Sasson 2, Boyd 2) beat St. Mike's B (Raco, Managom) 4-2 and took a default from the dentists. PHE (Nikolov 2) trimmed them (Boyd) 2-1, spilling a perfect record.

Jr. Eng lammed thrice, felled twice and kawiji'd once to pull the dentist's fangs 6-0. The young plumbers then aged New 1-0 on Feiler's goal, and sank the saints 2-0 on Kawiji's board.

The lawyers subpoenaed the dentists for malpractice and found them guilty on six counts. Majority opinions were recorded by Sheen, Hutchison, Bofo, Phillips, Deeth, and Hermie. No court reporter was present for a 1-1 tie with PHE. They found a loophole in the Endangered Species Act to bag the guns 2-0 and ended the season on a winning note.

Trin A also put on a late season spurt, starting with a tie versus New, 2-2 (for Trin Walsh, MacDonald; Lo, Zoravski). St. Mike's B (Catrina) were the victims of a 5-1 thrashing (Verney 2, Burger 2, MacDonald 1 try) trouncing PHE (Hawkins, Mohammad, Courtis) stopped the streak 3-1 (Parker) but the red and black was in the semis.

The tight situation in the third division loosened enough to clear the dust. Pharmacy was the only undefeated team in all three levels to take first. Grads came second and Eng III third. Trinity B sneaked into fourth ahead of Knox.

Trins had to get in the hard way, beating undefeated Grads (Stewart) 2-1 on a pair by De Wolf. Then they chopped the foresters (Sarafyn as usual) 4-1 on a pair by Chapman and singles from De Shark and Bruce Lee. They finished with the expected default from Innis.

Meanwhile, Forestry (Gabrek 2, Sarafyn, Goodison, Grewal) axed a hapless Emmanuel (Chamberlain) 5-1. The tree cutters ended with a default over the architects.

Pharmacy Hung and then Bradley Knox who couldn't muster enough Murray to counteract the medicine. Some druggist who thinks he's a doctor (I couldn't decipher his name on the scoresheet) notched six goals and Wong two as they edged Emmanuel 8-0. A 0-0 tie with Eng III maintained the virgin Pharmacy record.

Grads recovered from Trinity to grunge Innis (Romanowicz) 3-1 on goals by Duker, Fester, and Brown. They finished off by relegating Eng III to third on a goal by Fletcher. Cellar-dwellers Arch and Emmanuel appropriately played to a 2-2 tie (Arch by Booth, Lufti; Alston, Pendlebury).

Play-off predictions from this column are invariably wrong, but lots of fun to read. In the first, only SMC is finalized, and they will lose to either Eng or Erin. Vic will lose to the other, and Erin will win the title by one goal.

In the second Meds will have little trouble taking Trip A by two, and Jr. Eng will be able to squeeze by the football team by means of playing soccer. Meds ability in bad weather gives them the edge over Jr. Eng for the title.

In the third Pharmacy will have a tough time but should win against a come-from-behind Trip B squad. The high-scoring, fast Eng III offense goes against the big, heavy Grads defence with the strikers favored. The druggists will win an open fast final because of their defence.

In first division lacrosse Vic slipped from first in the stretch drive as the jocks relentlessly ground out the wins. The Erindale team still made fourth in spite of much reduction from last year, and a strong St. Mike's squad grabbed third.

SMC (Gilkinson 3, Crupi) edged Vic (Butler 3) 4-3. They demolished Devonshire (the inevitable Anderson with 2) 12-2 on Feick 4, Gilkinson 3, Higgins 2, Crupi) 7-6.

The jocks (Brown 5, MacNeil 2, Bagg 2, Numbroski) also erased

Erindale (Taillon 5, Sterritt, McConnell) 10-7, and (Brown 3, MacNeil 2, Sorbie 2, McGuey) eclipsed Engineers (Cruickshank 2, Zaticzek 2, Lambert, Audichuk) 8-6.

Vic (Butler 7, Young 3, Ralph, Orlando) to St. Mike's and clubbed Erin (Penvalla, Geraghty) 12-2. Then they destroyed Dev (Anderson 2 on Young's 6, Ralph's and Kearns' singles).

In other non-action Dev defaulted to Eng and Eng defaulted to Erin.

In the second division the first place spot went to Trinity, but second and third required a last game confrontation between Scarborough and Forestry, with the latter winning and entering the semis with Knox. Trins has a bye to the final against the winner.

Knox notted UC 3-0 (Bern 2, Tetlano). They (Bern 2, Renalds) scarred Scar (Smith, Cheng) and held onto a chance to repeat their title.

The foresters (Hosick 4, White 3) took a chainsaw against UC 7-0. The game against Scar featured axe handles and other brawling tools with an end result of 7-3 for the tree lovers (for For Hosick 5, White, Draper; Smith, Cheng, Bowyer).

Trinity (Possum 2, Beatonov, Sasquatch) trimmed Scar (Smith 2, Cheng) 4-3 on the way to the playoffs. Then they snatched a win when Storey scored with five second left versus UC (Huhtanen) to add to Beatonov's marker, and make it 2-1.

Parity-hungry SAC disrupts Academic Affairs

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The Students' Administrative Council, in the pursuit of its "mandate" from the recent referendum on student representation, disrupted a meeting of the Academic Affairs Committee yesterday to force the formation of a parity subcommittee to consider various methods for the selection of students for hiring, staffing and tenure committees.

When the committee rejected a motion by student governor Gord Barnes that the committee ask U of T president John Evans to use his authority to set up a separate parity committee, SAC vice-president Seymour Kanowitch, not a committee member, rose from the floor to declare "the students will not allow the committee to meet further."

"I'm afraid, Mr. Chairman, but this meeting is over," Kanowitch announced. Kanowitch said that the Forster task force had not considered the seating of students on the staffing hiring and firing committees because it had been unable to decide how students should be selected.

"The students say that a committee should be set up to decide the method of selection," Kanowitch declared.

"The Academic Affairs Committee has just defeated a proposal that would have solved the inadequacies of the Forster task force."

The students refused to allow the meeting to continue. But Scarborough College principal Ralph Campbell moved that a subcommittee of Academic Affairs be set up, composed equally of student and faculty.

Academic Affairs chairman J. E. Dove, defining such a committee's terms of reference, suggested that it should deal exclusively with student selections for various committees "with the necessity of student selection to be decided later."

The motion so defined, was carried unanimously.

The students left the meeting and the committee moved on to other matters. But not before SAC officials voiced their opposition to the subcommittee motion.

Frank Nagle, returning officer for last month's referendum — said that he did not want to see the committee "go through another facade of democracy and report back in two months, with the proposals of the subcommittee to be defeated then."

The committee, he said, in the case of student representation, would form up in "a monolithic block" and defeat any pro-student motions.

"Another committee, another charade," Nagle sighed.

SAC Women's Committee chairwoman Heather Ridout declared that the proposed subcommittee was "illegitimate," the product of a "committee that does not have enough students on it."

The Academic Affairs Committee has eight student members (undergraduate, graduate and part-time). There are 25 people on the committee.

But SAC president Bob Anderson expressed his satisfaction that the committee had, in effect, "reversed its decision" and that it had been made clear to the Academic Affairs Committee that "it has to act in good faith unless it wants a repetition of today's incident."

The committee itself had earlier intended to consider the recommendations of the report in the order in which they appear in the report.

Dove said that this method of procedure would not mean putting off until the end of term — when student committee members would be concerned with exams — the controversial items of the reports.

"And this procedure", he said, "will give the committee experience in the document — which is not an easy document to read or to understand." The report was released in early August.

Dove even mentioned the possibility of the consideration of the document by a small task force — should the Academic Affairs Committee itself be unable to make decisions.

But he suggested that the committee ask itself if it was now in a position to determine the terms of reference for that committee, its composition and the necessity for such a committee (that is, whether or not, Academic Affairs could not itself make the necessary decisions).

Dove noted that the student spectators in attempting to address the committee directly had used their privileges "rather extensively." "We don't have privileges; we have rights," Kanowitch responded. "At SAC committee meetings we let other people talk."

Kanowitch claimed that the committee was refusing to recognize the students "because we win the discussions; you only win the votes."

"Who are you? Who do you represent?" asked committee faculty member W. B. Dunphy.

"What right do you have to claim to represent 20,000 students?"

The students pointed to the referendum results.

The committee had earlier recognized Anderson and allowed him to speak.

Anderson said that the university is facing "a very very serious situation."

"Students have clearly — overwhelmingly — demanded representation on those committees on which they do not presently have representation. And they have demanded parity representation."

"The Faculty Association is clearly split on the issue, although a majority is against student representation."

"Only two of the 11 members of the Forster task force were students. And one of these was appointed over the explicit objections of his constituency."

Anderson said that "there is a definite student view point and that it really has not been considered up to now."

"It is most depressing that on the most contentious issues the university doesn't take a stand and that it throws these issues to committees."

"The student and faculty groups are seemingly irreconcilable."

"I have felt strong support for the student position in interviews with the press. And this issue may very easily become a very public one."

"Yet their support is not in the best interests of the university."

"The government would like to exercise more direct control of the university and such an issue — widely publicized — would be a suitable opportunity for them."

In a later telephone interview Anderson noted that "the government traditionally has not been interested in tenure and other similar issues. But it is very clearly interested in other recommendations of the Forster report, such as recommendation that staff be fired for fiscal reasons."

SAC will be meeting to discuss strategy tomorrow at the SAC building at 8 pm.

Gov. Council report indicates Food Science phase-out

The long uncertain history about the future of the Faculty of Food Sciences will soon end in the eventual dissolution of the present faculty, if a report from the Planning and Resources committee gets a positive vote at the committee's meeting tomorrow.

Planning & Resources has been considering what to do with the faculty since 1972, being the third committee to consider the problem since the questions of academic standards and possible duplication of courses brought the subject to the forefront in 1969. Since then, the faculty has been in a suspended state with its future uncertain.

In June, 1973, the committee brought a report to Governing Council that recommended virtual dissolution of the faculty, but the report was sent back after complaints from people inside the faculty that they hadn't been consulted.

So the committee went back at the problem and the report has reemerged with little changed.

The administration is concerned about, among other courses, a program in Textile and Community Development that, according to the university, is a financial risk. Other courses would be relocated, such as the popular Nutrition, Dietetics and Food Chemistry programs, which will be combined with the department of nutrition of the School of Hygiene to form a new department.

Other specialized programs will be phased out in the general streamlining of resources that the administration is trying to enforce because of the tight budgeting necessary in the last few years.

In an administration rationale for its Food Science policy, it stated: "In the present era of financial restriction and no growth in enrolment, it is essential that the university husband its resources in order to derive the optimum benefit for its academic objectives. Of the various approaches that might be taken to achieve this, the more obvious include elimination of unnecessary duplication of courses and of concentration of like resources."

Teaching staff in the old Food Sciences courses will, according to the report, be relocated in the new department where they will "provide optional subjects within the department broadening the major Nutrition and Food Science Stream."

McMaster University has acquired a larger piece of the action in Toronto's booming downtown area—right next to where phase 2 of the Eaton-Fairview development is planned in 1980.

The steel-town university paid Montreal Trust $615,000 this January to gain the remaining two-thirds ownership of the Woolworth's building on the corner of Queen and Yonge.

McMaster had earlier received the first third of the property for the bargain basement price of one dollar in 1917. This act of charity was naturally enough from the trustees of the will of the late Senator William McMaster, who founded the university in Toronto in 1887.

McMaster now owns property at 180, 182 and 184 Yonge Street, next door to the property owned by the T. Eaton Company at 186 Yonge.

The McMaster property is two doors down from 188 Yonge, the location of the Reitman's building being sold to the Eaton's-Fairview Corporation by the U of T. The sale is proceeding despite a provision in the 1922 will of Naomi Bilton which forbids the university from selling the property to Eaton's or any company representing Eaton's in any way.

The McMaster property is about four times as large as the Reitman's building. Ironically, the part of the Woolworth's building recently sold to McMaster was also the result of a will. Margaret Jones, in 1895 will, left the properties at 182 and 184 Yonge to her two sons and a daughter in trust.

By 1942 Montreal Trust had taken over the administration of the estate, while continuing to lease to Woolworth's.

The Jones will, unlike Bilton's, had no unusual riders. She did stipulate, however, that any sale of the property would have to be approved by her heirs and that proceeds of the sale would have to be used to buy lands in the Toronto area or municipal debentures.

The property at 180 Yonge was initially sold by the Crown to the trustees of William McMaster's estate in 1899 for the then huge sum of $101,750. It was first leased to the father of Buffalo sports magnate Seymour Knox, and then to Woolworth's in 1915 at the rate of $17,500 a year.

At this point McMaster got into the act, taking the land for one dollar and continuing the Woolworth lease. This was renewed in 1937 and again in 1959, this time for 21 years at $32,700 a year.

The lease expires in 1980, just when Eaton's Fairview will be looking for future ground to break in Phase 2 of its mammoth development just a stone's throw away.

The Eaton centre will take up about 15 acres of prime real estate in downtown, resulting in the demolition of a host of shops and other buildings to make way for a three level shopping mall, another Eaton's department store, a parking garage and 35 storey office.

McMaster is now in the right spot at the right time. The property at 180, 182 and 184 Yonge is the only corner left untouched under the Phase 1 development. U of T's sale of 188 Yonge to Fairview completed the land grab that Eaton's and Fairview had been pursuing for many years before the Eaton Centre deal was made public in 1967.

McMaster has a piece of downtown action

This part of Yonge St. is already under demolition for phase 1 of the Eaton Center plan, which hopes to gobble up three further pieces of land owned by McMaster University. U of T has already sold 188 Yonge to Fairview Corp.

How Roots give your feet
a good feeling,
then send it up your spine.

To see the idea behind Roots, take a side-view look at the shoe. Instead of a heel to lift you up and tilt you forward you'll find a one-piece base to plant you firmly in touch with Mother Earth. Roots, you see, work very much like roots. And if you take a side-view look at the human foot, you'll see why they work as well as they do. Your heel is the lowest part of your foot, so in Roots it sits in the lowest part of your shoe.

Suddenly you stand straighter as additional muscles, the back of your legs and the small of your back, spring to life to help hold you up and move you around. Now consider that recess in your sole called the arch. If you spend a good deal of time on your feet, unsupported as they can sag and may fall out of shape altogether. (This is why in those pre-curve days, a police man was known as a flatfoot.) To help prevent your arches from falling, Roots are contoured to support them. There's a smaller recess between the balls of your feet which Roots will take care of as well.

1052 Yonge Street
(Opposite Riverdale Secondary Station)

Near the front, you'll notice the sole is curved like a rocker. In normal walking, your weight lands first on your heel, shifts along the outer side of your foot, then diagonally across to your big toe which springs you off on your next step. The rocker idea simply makes that transfer of weight a little easier, which makes each step a little less tiring.

All told, Roots bring a good, natural feeling to man's somewhat un-natural custom of treading hard floors and city sidewalks. Roots are designed and made in Canada; and at the heart of our production are two generations of cobblers (a father and three sons) who cling to the promise that good quality footwear must still be made largely by hand. The way we feel about making Roots has a lot to do with the way you'll feel wearing them.

City feet need Roots.

Evans' budget solution: restrict wage hikes

By DICK BROWN

A confidential report by university president John Evans recommends the university reduce its debt by restricting the rate of wage increases given to university employees in the fiscal years 1975-76 and 1976-77.

The report, signed by Evans last Thursday, will be presented at the Business Affairs Committee meeting today for consideration before this month's Governing Council meeting on November 22.

Evans' report indicates that any additional income the university receives during those years due to increased enrolment ought to be used to reduce U of T's cumulative debt of $3.1 million or to "provide additional resources for priority programs." He does not recommend such extra money be used for wages.

Evans calls on the Planning and Resources Committee of Governing Council to develop a financial policy which would "establish the relative priority of maintaining salary levels or reducing number of staff within the financial parameters reflected by that policy."

Reducing the number of staff for financial reasons was a subject covered in the Forster task force report on academic appointments, which spelled out a contingency plan to lay off tenured staff should university money run short.

The Forster task force said in its majority report that such reductions in teaching staff should only occur after "drastic reductions in non-academic spending, reductions in the library budget or research facilities, and selective or across-the-board salary reductions for members of the teaching staff."

The confidential Evans report suggests only two ways to deal with the problem of eliminating the university's cumulative deficit and both tie the rate of increase of wages to elimination of budget deficit.

Evans' report does not mention other methods of financial belt tightening, nor does he say why he projects no cumulative university deficit by April, 1975, as one possibility.

The bookkeeping device Evans uses to curb the rate of wage increase is to tie wage increase for employees to the Basic Income Unit (BIU), the per-capita grant scheme the provincial government uses to fund universities based on student enrolment.

Under the BIU scheme, the university receives a set amount of money calculated from a formula based on the number of students at the university. The larger the number of students, the more money the university gets from the government to reduce the system to its simplest terms.

Currently the BIU is just over $1,800. Evans says in his report that for the fiscal years 1972-73 through 1974-75 the BIU will increase. University budgets are drawn up one year in advance.

Evans' report suggests there are only two ways to look at reducing the university's cumulative deficit and wages.

The first system he proposes would be that wage rates increase at double the percentage increase in the value of the BIU which he says reflects the pattern of the fiscal years 1972-73, 1973-74 and 1974-75.

This current pattern he rejects and instead recommends the second way to look at the problem: tying wage increases to the dollar increase coming from the increase in the BIU rate. If that generates any excess income, Evans recommends the money be put into deficit reduction or priority programs rather than wages.

Eans says in his report his recommendations are based on the following assumptions:

- no change in the present provincial slip-year grant structure in which universities receive their per capita grants based on student population from the previous December 1;

- no change in U of T's tuition fees structure;

- no change in fiscal arrangements with the federated colleges;

- no emergent or compensatory grants for the Scarborough and Erindale campuses.

Evans calls for "underspending" to the amount of $1 million per budget year, beginning with the 1974-75 budget to reduce the university's cumulative debt. Underspending simply is a bureaucratic way of saying not to spend $1 million which would have been spent.

He specifically calls for the Planning and Resources committee to draw up plans for underspending, particularly at the St. George Campus, and the extra money from enrolment increases at St. George to be used to help wipe out the university's debt.

By introducing his proposed system of gearing wages to the actual BIU increase rate, Evans projects in his report that by the fiscal year 1976-77 the university's cumulative deficit will be just over $1 million compared to a $4.4 million deficit if wages were increased at double the percentage increase rate of the BIU.

Evans also projects a steadily increasing total income for the university. The total income for the 1974-75 fiscal year he projects at $139.2 million to rise to $151.9 million by the 1976-77 fiscal year.

Expenditures for the same period he projects as rising to $153.3 million from $142 million if wages are based on a direct ratio to the BIU, and rising to $157.9 million from $142 million if wages are based on the doubled percentage increase of the BIU.

Scarborough and Erindale are budgeted for deficits throughout this period, but Evans' report indicates much of their deficits would be offset by surpluses as high as $2.4 million per year at the St. George campus if wage-rate-increases are pegged on the actual dollar value increase of the BIU.

If wage-rates were pegged on double percentage increase, Evans says, the St. George campus would also register a $3.4 million deficit by 1976-77.

Michael Lawrie, president of the Medical Society, argues against the faculty proposal for the HPF grading system at the Med Sci Auditorium. The faculty-dominated council decided to keep the present system.

Pass-fail grading rejected by Meds Faculty Council

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The Medical Faculty Council decided Monday to retain the Honors-Pass-Fail system of grading which has been in effect at the Medical School for the past five years.

The faculty-dominated council voted against the student Medical Society's motion that all grading be pass-fail. They also voted against a faculty member's motion to return to the old numerical grading which was replaced by the HPF system.

The recommendation which fueled the controversy was introduced by Dr. Pierce. He said it was a compromise which attempted to satisfy both the faculty and students.

HPF rating would be the only one to appear on the student's transcript, the winning motion said, and "qualitative assessment" as well as other available material would be used as a basis for assessment.

A letter of recommendation would also be appended to the transcript, and numerical grades would still be confidentially used to determine prizes and research under the endorsed system.

The president of the Medical Society, Michael Lawrie, spoke for an amendment which would have made the marking system completely pass-fail.

"The pass-fail system," said Lawrie, "will still recognize excellence, as 'Honors' is supposed to do now, but the excellence will be for total performance on a day-to-day basis, not just academic excellence based on marks at the end of the year."

"Students who don't get honors now are disadvantaged, but there isn't really that much difference between a 79 and an 84."

Lawrie said that referendums have shown that over 80 per cent of the students, including most of the Honors students, wish to see the "honors" designation dropped. This showed, he said, that it was not the worst students who wanted pass-fail, and that students would continue to work hard under such a system.

Leading the faculty rearguard action, Dr. Gornall stated that "marks don't promote cruel competition but instead provide a good stimulus." Without it, he said, there is an eventual deterioration in standards.

Dr. Gornall also expressed fear that the rights of the individual were being "suppressed" when he was not allowed to have his marks. This hurt the best students most, he said.

Another Medical Society member, Victor Shasko, said many other medical schools in Canada and the United States have a pass-fail system, including Harvard and Yale.

"There is a swing to pass-fail and we wouldn't be hurt by it," said Shasko. McMaster has it and they placed near the top in the last licencing examinations."

An unidentified first year medical student said: "The emphasis here should be on producing 240 good doctors, not just a few superstars with honors. In the competitive atmosphere that now exists, the students don't share knowledge or help each other because they're trying to get those all-important marks."

Curiously enough, none of the faculty present spoke for the pass-fail system and after further debate the student's motion was defeated.

Dr. Gornall then introduced an amendment that would have allowed students to request their marks on request.

Lawrie said that this would eventually force all students to release their marks to graduate schools and hospitals or face possible discrimination.

Dr. Seeman, obviously speaking for the majority of the faculty, said, "Let's stick to our compromise. It's clear what would happen if we

Hart House cries blues but it's in the black

A confidential report headed for today's Business Affairs Committee meeting signs a different tune than the Hart House blues we've been hearing lately.

Last month a task force looking into the Hart House finance squeeze suggested the possibility of a fund-drive to offset the difficulties. The difficulties of Hart House don't seem so apparent from the report, which shows a $21,285 surplus at April 30 of this year compared to a slim $5,429 showed last year.

Most of the increase in income comes from the inclusion of women in Hart House fee payments, which increased fee income from $294,320 to $466,019. The biggest rise in expenses in 1972-73 was under the heading of committees.

The task force report suggested Hart House was in trouble because of the new programs and renovations required in the building's programs.

Hart Houses' largest expense in operation was to pay staff which amounted to $264,632, an increase of about $50,000 from the year before.

The surplus of funds for last year brings the house's working capital to $153,079.

Old Wives Tail running at the University College Playhouse until tomorrow, is an effective series of theatrical vignettes unified by a chivalrous knight's search for a legendary princess.

Around that basic plot, director Allen Booth has skilfully assembled scenes involving all of the various characters on the trail to the princess. They range from a marvellously clumsy banjo player through two pretender princesses to two zealous crusaders who lack the hero's necessary flash. They must all contend with a blue meanie who keeps the princess under lock and key.

Old Wives Tail makes imaginative use of the entire visual and audible space of the Playhouse, and the actors are all adept at fading in and out of the quickly changing lights.

A support rally for Artistic Woodwork workers tomorrow at noon in the Sid Smith foyer will bring union representatives, Toronto aldermen and strike support committee members to speak on the two and one half month struggle of a small group of immigrant workers to win a living wage, union security, and the right to strike.

The rally is a prelude to Thursday night's conference on strikebreaking, the police and the fight of the Artistic strikers and all workers in small shops in the Toronto area. The conference, featuring numerous speakers, is sponsored by the Canadian Textile & Chemical Union and will take place at the Ontario College of Education (Bloor near Spadina) at 8 pm.

Students to police students

Students must stop discipline code

Students at this university have taken it in the ear from the administration over the past few years, and, as of late their sole response has been to kiss the administration's ass.

First the discipline code was passed by the Governing Council last June, when students weren't around to demonstrate their opposition. That's a long-standing Simcoe Hall strategy. But more recently the tribunal structures themselves were approved to be sent forward to the next Governing Council meeting, November 22.

The situation is ridiculous. The tribunal structures force students to police themselves, and some of the student governors are beaming with satisfaction that they helped make it all possible.

But the dangerous discipline code must not be allowed to pass through the Governing Council. It lacks legitimacy for several reasons. First, it's nothing more than a token effort in the direction of the 1969 Campbell discipline code recommendations. That discipline committee task force consisted of equal staff-student representation. But the Campbell committee report was dropped rather hastily when it hit the Simcoe Hall labyrinth and what we now see is the result of bureaucratic tampering, notably that of U of T's "first lady", Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway and 'student' Paul Cadario.

A second reason for rejecting the code is the totally condescending manner in which it was put together. Students weren't, as usual, consulted on a broad scale. However, the unrepresentative students on U of T's Governing Council were asked to comment — elitism at its most visible form.

And let's not forget, the Governing

Council itself is an illegitimate body, representing the backroom politics of faculty and government administrators in the summer of 1971 while the new U of T Act was going through the legislature, that time it was broadly recognized, even by the students' opponents that students had made a better case for parity on the Governing Council than the faculty had made in opposing it.

But it took a faculty threat to shut down the university to bring about the present Governing Council structure. Judging by the recent spate of acclamations of student "governors", students are beginning to realize their irrelevant position.

Students should not police other students. That situation would mean a further extension of the situation of the past two years where students help administrators, faculty, and government appointees on the Governing Council. Students are playing right into Simcoe Hall's back pockets, and it's a game that students can't win until structural change is brought about.

The discipline code as it now stands would implicate a student for walking into a university-owned door and damaging it, if it were taken to its illogical extreme. And even if the code weren't applied the deterrent effect would already be there.

Hopefully it's obvious that a code of behaviour for the university is the beginning of the end for academic freedoms of any sort. Its existence would demonstrate that the administration's manipulative antics aren't good enough to enable it to control the student body without a code, and that it might have to use it in the near future. But the code won't come into effect until early December of perhaps 1974. Students still have a chance to demonstrate their opposition to an unjust and unnecessary penal system.

Just as a mass demonstration fore-ed former U of T president Claude Bissell to back down from his 1969 discipline statement saying he would call police on campus if necessary a mass protest of the present code would show the administration that students are indeed displeased.

The administration has shown in the past that it won't bust 500 heads, but it will use force on a group of 50 or less.

In the struggle for undergraduate stack access to the Roberts library two years ago then-acting president Jack Sword called in Metro police to expel a small number of students from sitting in the Senate chambers at Simcoe Hall, but when 500 students occupied the Senate two days later Sword was forced to cave in to students' demands.

Students still have the potential to force the administration to back down if they choose to do so. Think about it; what if you accidentally became involved and got busted?

Simcoe Hall plans northwest campus push

Faced with a cut back in provincial government building funds the University of Toronto is apparently attempting to remove any budgetary deficits by 1975-76. And our guess is that it's attempting to put itself in a good credit position to borrow funds for its north-west campus push.

It's no secret that the university owns most of the land and presently-occupied houses between Harbord-Bloor and Spadina-St. George. But what the university isn't talking about is its future plans for the extension of its empire to the "northwest campus".

The so-called Chiller plant has already wormed its way into the area, and Internal Affairs Vice-president Jill Conway has reportedly been talking with some people from Campus Co-operative Residence, gauging their feelings on any future block-busting by the administration. Simcoe Hall is also once again talking about new athletic facilities, and one scheme for development is a new field house that would threaten the advisory bureau and nearby houses on Glen Morris St.

Apparently Simcoe Hall's greatest cost increases in the past few years have been in unionized labor and their solution to this cost squeeze is to cut the rates of salary increases

Expenses for parking, for example, have increased over the past two years, but the chief reason for the increased costs has been higher salary and benefit expenses. Most material costs have gone down.

The administration is, therefore, rationalizing its operation, just as any efficient business would do. Whereas the salary/wage rate percentage increase has been double the percentage increase in value of the Basic Income Unit from 1971 and will remain so through to 1975, the administration now intends to propose that a formula which limits the increase in expenditures on salary and wages to the dollar increase in income arising from the increase in the BIU rate. And the recommendations come from John Evans.

The new scheme is likely to coincide with the Forster report recommendations with respect to faculty salaries, etc. The Forster report spelled out a plan to lay off faculty members should the university run short of money, and with a new development plan sitting on the shelf the administration has already begun to move in the direction of a choice between people or plans, and people seem to be losing.

Support staff and faculty members at this university might like to look further into the situation; they may not have jobs this time next year unless some concrete opposition is taken to the Business Affairs' proposals.

The target of their wrath should be super-bureaucrat John Evans. It's becoming increasingly obvious that Evans was made president to streamline administrative and faculty costs and methods — sort of a technocrat's technocrat. So far he's been able to do what he's wanted to around the university. However it's John Evans' own report that recommends the salary changes, and it's John Evans' task force on academic appointments (it wasn't set up as an Academic Affairs task force, as one might expect). Evans plans are slowly falling into place. Isn't it about time we started demonstrating some opposition?

Arab-Jewish unity only way to peace

For those who would still argue that the Palestinians became a nation of exiles voluntarily, the truth is well documented by Israeli s themselves. Menachem Begin, who was the leader during the 1948 war of the right-wing terrorist organization, the Irgun, and who was taken into the Israeli cabinet in 1967, wrote in his book, The Revolt, Story of the Irgun: "The legend of Deir Yassin (a village where the Irgun carried out a massacre of some 250 Arab men, women, and children) helped us in particular in the saving of Tiberias and the conquest of Haifa... Arabs throughout the country... were seized with limitless panic and started to flee for their lives. This mass flight soon developed into a maddened uncontrollable stampede."

The expulsion of the bulk of the Palestinian people, the institutionalized oppression of Arabs in Israeli-occupied territory, the predatory militarism of Israeli society, and the guarantee of future wars in the Middle East all issue from the character of the Zionist entity—the fact that it is a colonial-settler state, and instrument of imperialist hegemony. Its struggle for independence, realized in 1948, was no more an anti-imperialist struggle than was that of white supremacist-dominated Rhodesia's efforts to sever the British connection. Had the situation in Palestine been otherwise, had the Jews been an oppressed minority there, then Arab-Jewish unity would have appeared not only as a possibility, but as a necessity in the fight to repel foreign masters. Instead, those who came to be known as Israelis used the capital of Britain, France, the United States and Diaspora Jewry, as well as the diplomatic support of the Soviet Union, to create a power base for the west in Palestine against the will of its inhabitants.

But still today, the potential for Arab-Jewish unity remains as the only hope for a new Middle East devoid of war. The question is: what is to be the political basis of such a unity? And what are the tasks that confront it?

It is clear that any unity, to be both just and lasting, must be based on a resolution of the problems of the peoples involved, or at least on taking up the struggle toward that end. What it means is dealing with the social questions often hidden by nationalist fulmination on both sides of the current conflict. It means tackling the problems of poverty, ignorance and disease, and the powerlessness of the Middle east masses that is both a cause and an effect of their condition. Only new social and productive relations, based on equality and cooperation, in all of the countries of that world sector, can harness the necessary resources to once and for all end exploitation and want, obviating the need for war.

But to carry out such a monumental program will require a great struggle. What is posed is a social revolution that will expropriate the interests of the military and economic elites on both sides, and bring the masses of Jewish and Arab workers and poor farmers to power.

Such a program is not posed here in the abstract. There are concrete forces working now for its achievement. It cannot be denied that these forces are presently quite small; but more important is that they represent the future. As the fourth Middle Eastern war in little than a generation simmers quietly, with battle exhaustion, civil privation, and national demoralization taking their toll on both sides, the program of revolutionary internationalism emerges more cogent and attractive. As an alternative to the present chauvinist leaderships, it is becoming a real third force in the Middle East. And no one is more aware of this fact than those in power in the Israeli and Arab regimes.

In 1972 and early 1973, massive demonstrations involving Egyptian students and workers took place in Cairo and Helwan. These actions demanded nationalization of the holdings of US imperialism, arming the Egyptian masses to fight Israel, ending the policies of negotiating through the US and the United Nations, and seizing the wealth of the war speculators and Egyptian capitalists to finance the struggle against Zionist aggression.

The Sadat regime responded by attacking these demonstrators with the army and police forces. Sadat announced his intention to continue to attempt to attain a 'settlement' through Washington and Moscow, and uses warfare as a pressure tactic on the big powers. Another tactic, the recent expulsion of Soviet technicians from Egypt, failed, however, to change the American posture on Israel and acted as a springboard to the present war.

But even in war, the objective of the Arab regimes is not the destruction of Israel, a precondition of the restoration of Palestinian rights. According to Time magazine (Oct. 22): "Neither the Egyptians nor the Syrians talk any longer about driving Israel into the sea. In fact, Egyptian president Anwar Sadat declared 'I am prepared to accept Israel as a state in the Middle East, but not as a new Ottoman Empire.'"

This back sliding on the part of the Arab leaders can occur only because of the setbacks already suffered by the Palestinian liberation movement. In 1970, and again in 1971, the Jordanian regime of King Hussein launched a bloody assault on the resistance organizations, literally decimating their cadres. The focus of this attack was the revolutionary socialist Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PDPFLP), which had led the Arab workers of Irbid, Jordan's second largest city, to establish soviet power there (i.e. democratic workers' councils ruling the city, expropriation of the private interests). Massed on Jordan's western borderlands was the Israeli army, ready to back up Hussein in the event the civil war had gone badly.

The PDPFLP, which continues to operate in most of the above-mentioned, still agitates programmatically for "the establishment of a peoples' democratic Palestinian state in which the Arabs and (Israeli) Jews will live without any discrimination whatsoever. A state which is against all forms of class and national subjugation, and which gives both Arabs and (Israeli) Jews the right to develop their national culture." And to advance that struggle, as well as to solve the social tasks in the Arab countries, the PDPFLP leads the fight for social revolution where it is located.

The same cannot be said of the other guerrilla organizations. The two most prominent ones, El Fatah and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), generally view the Arab bourgeoisie as their allies, and refrain from intervention in the politics of the various countries.

And finally, we must shift our attention to Israel, and its attitude towards revolutionary anti-Zionists there. In a country whose legal system does not even provide for habeus corpus rights, nothing stands in the way of censorship, physical repression, and the outlaw of dissident organizations. These uses of state power to intimidate and smash leftists are as commonplace as the periodic political raids on Arab communities in the occupied zones. With the level of the class struggle in Israel on the ascent (for example, a rising number of strikes) the use of these tactics on the Israeli working class as a whole will become more and more the case.

The revolutionary defeatism of the anti-Zionists plays a key role in the developing working class radicalization, and prepares the way for a class alliance with revolutionary Arab workers at home and abroad. Aware that this is so, the state has been hardest on the anti-Zionists, especially Jews of that political persuasion.

In a statement made to his tribunal, Rami Livneh, one of the Jewish defendants, said: "We, the revolutionary communists in Israel, know well from our own experience that only the common fight of the exploited masses of both peoples can be the way toward liberation, and that the liberation cannot be just the political liberation of the Palestinians alone. We know that in order to liberate itself from its ideological association with the Arab bourgeoisie and to strive for the rule of the poor masses of the people of the whole region; we know that in order to free itself from the exile and the degradation, from the hopelessness and the distress, the Palestinian people has to agree to a pact with the exploited Jewish masses in Israel itself — those very same masses that today turn their backs on any idea of collaboration between Arabs and Jews. It is towards this that most of our political activities are directed. In this we see part of both our political and human mission.

At the core of the developing anti-Zionist movement are the Israeli Trotskyists, the group called Matzpen-Marxist. Like their comrades in the Revolutionary Communist Group in Lebanon, and those in all the various sections of the Fourth International around the world, they are doing active anti-imperialist propaganda, and forging links with the Palestinian struggle. As well they are building the international Leninist party, whose leadership, they would argue, is crucial to successfully taking up the fight against "the big capitalist powers as well as the principal bureaucratized workers' states (Russia and China), partners in the status quo."

Commenting on the current conflict, the Political Bureau of Matzpen-Marxist released on October 7 a statement, of which the following is an excerpt: "In a time of crisis, the people must be united." In a time of crisis, the people must be united. Such unity allows the authorities to strike new blows against the democratic rights that the Jewish population in Israel still possesses. There will be new anti-strike laws, new limitations on freedom of the press, on freedom of organization, etc. In this way the Jewish workers will learn in their bones that 'a people that oppresses another people cannot be free.' This war is not our war... But we pledge ourselves before the working class of the whole world to use this war to expose to the Jewish masses the fatal death trap that Zionism represents for them, the permanent war that it represents; that is how we will be able to break the Jewish workers from Zionism and join them to the revolutionary war of the Arab masses against imperialism, Zionism, and Arab reaction."

Agitation in Israel towards relinquishing the occupied territories will be the central work of the Matzpen-Marxist in the coming period, as it has been up to now. Very critical support for the military efforts of the various Arab countries towards the reclamation of Palestinian land will also be raised internationally. The fact that the current Arab leaderships are both unwilling and unable to discharge that and other important tasks will also be pointed out, and thereby their ouster by the masses is politically prepared.

But whether the revolutionary class alliance of Arabs and Jews can be made a viable third force in Middle Eastern politics, or not, will have a lot to say about the longevity of this wasteful, brutal, and nearly continuous warfare. It will also determine the very ability of the Jews in the Middle East to survive, for the failure of class politics to triumph in this area almost courts the inevitability of a massacre that will rival the horrors of Auschwitz.

State intervention rescues capitalism

By MICHAEL MILOFF

Canadian University Press

The Canadian state has worked hard to make democracy safe for capitalism, its many bureaucratic organs (the executive and legislative branches, the judiciary, the military, crown corporations and regulatory commissions) faithfully co-ordinate the exploitation strategies of corporate wealth.

In both Keynesian and Marxist economic theory, the increased intervention of the state in the economic life of the nation has become the means by which capitalism rescues itself from collapse.

The relationship between the economic institutions of capitalism and the legal fictions of the state was revealed by the recent events in Chile. When the state's activities threatened the accumulation of private capital, a right-wing recapturing of the state apparatus was organized. Liberal fantasies to the contrary, the state has rarely served to lessen the injustices of the capitalist economic system.

The many activities of the state not only reinforce the essential features of monopoly capitalism but also propagate the image of the state as an instrument of social reform.

"The executive of the modern state is but a committee for managing the common affairs of the whole bourgeoisie"
—Karl Marx

The state is now "big business". Over one-third of the gross national product passes under the control of the various levels of Canadian government. And the vast majority of these funds are spent on providing a secure and profitable environment for corporate investment. The Canadian governments have subsidized the development of the massive transportation and hydro-electric systems (that is, the infrastructure) and have heavily financed those supporting services which are too risky or yield too little profit for corporate investment.

In order for capitalist economies to function at optimum levels, the consumer and labour markets must be linked to the extractive and productive regions. Although the enormous costs of railroads, highways and airlines (which are either crown corporations or heavily subsidized) have benefited those middle-class consumers who can afford them, the main advantages accrue to business.

Over 75 per cent of all airline travel is by businessmen and 85 per cent of all rail service is for private enterprise. Highways, promoted by both the automobile and construction lobbies, have consumed hundreds of millions of tax dollars in connecting highly profitable but isolated resource-extraction industries to US markets. The net result is that, "The tremendous sums spent developing the transportation grid have permitted a systematic, rationalized exploitation of the natural resource sector of the Canadian economy . . . The state, by underwriting the expense of the transportation grid and 'socializing' the costs, has intensified the crisis in one instance and has been responsible for reinforcing the dependence of the Canadian hinterland upon the Industrial metropolis to the south on the other." Rick Deaton, Our Generation.

The development of hydro electric power has been a similar boon to the private sector. While corporations use some 70 per cent of the energy, they contribute only 60 per cent of the cost. Naturally, the citizen gains from the lower prices but in all cases there is what Rick Deaton, a researcher for the Canadian Union of Public Employees has aptly called, "a private benefit at a public cost."

But private enterprise has wangled even more direct favors from the state through tax concessions and grants. Although corporate profits have grown more rapidly than personal income over the last twenty years, their contribution to federal tax revenues has declined from 28 to 12 per cent.

There are now so many loopholes masquerading as laws that corporations publicly produce one set of statistics for their stockholders, call "profits" and another set for the government, call "taxable income".

The resource-extraction industry, mostly foreign-owned, is closely connected with the government.

Imperial Oil, which earned a profit of $1.5 billion between 1965-71, paid taxes of only $290 million — a rate of 19 per cent.

Shell Oil, which made a profit of $500 million between 1964 and 1969, won their "shell game" with the government and paid no income tax whatsoever.

Nelcor did INCO which made a profit of $94 million in 1969. Indeed, it received a tax credit from the government of $2.8 million despite laying off 2,000 workers.

Over one-half of Canada's 200,000 corporations paid absolutely no income tax in 1971. Furthermore, most of $4.7 billion of legally deferred income tax and $677 million of legally allowed excessive depreciation claims were breaks given to large US-based multinationals.

It is hardly re-assuring to be offered the rationalization that benefits to corporations will ultimately work their way down to the worker. This "trickle-down" defence of capitalism has as many holes as the taxation system and, curiously, the same defenders plug them. The failure of these programs has been accidentally illustrated by the Liberal party's Department of Regional Economic Expansion (DREE).

The DREE machine

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was established to gain votes and diminish regional disparities by increasing employment in the underdeveloped areas — particularly the Atlantic region and eastern Quebec. The previous corporate welfare programs had been relatively haphazard, although from 1965 onwards, the Regional Development and Area Development Incentives Acts had succeeded in wasting so much money, that Jean Marchand, former head of DREE, was prompted to comment about the grants, "We would be providing some companies with more incentive than they really need and the difference would be a windfall profit at a public expense".

Marchand was possessed with a prophetic irony. Since 1969 DREE has given away approximately one and a half billion dollars in grants to corporations. Certain groups have raised their status in Canadian society, notably the 95 corporations which traditionally support the Liberal party and the corporations represented by the various businessmen, who in a non-conflict of interest, sit on DREE's Advisory Board. However, the Canadian economy as a whole has probably suffered.

Through an unco-ordinated pursuit of incompetent policies DREE has actually increased the unemployment rolls in many areas. For example:

In 1971 DREE gave $15 million to the "needy" firm of Proctor and Gamble in order to build a mill that produced Kraft bleached paper.

In 1972, it gave $13 million to much-maligned ITT to build a pulp mill in Quebec. The result of this subsidized competition in a shaky industry was that 875 workers in an existing company in Temiscamincque, Quebec were thrown out of work.

The story of Celanese Canada is equally amazing. Celanese received a government grant of $500,000 which it used to consolidate its weaving operations. So, the company laid off 450 workers in one plant and added 15 jobs in the other two plants. They then sold the closed plant to another corporate group which re-opened it and rapidly received a $2.5 million grant from DREE officials. This created jobs for 436 workers.

Altogether then $3 million was spent in the creation of one job in the weaving industry.

DREE has a special affection for large corporations. Northern Electric, a subsidiary of Bell, which has earned a profit of $1 billion in the past 10 years, received a $10 million grant in 1969 and then laid off 5,000 workers the following year. DREE has also made friendly overtures to other independently wealthy corporations: B. F. Goodrich ($1.1 million), Union Carbide ($2 million), and IBM ($6 million).

The Quebec Federation of Labour states that DREE has perpetuated outside control of Quebec's economy, neglected the poorer areas of the province, and given most of its grants to the large corporations who then treat the money as a gift.

Furthermore, the Canadian state has suggested that it would be wise to subsidize small-scale manufacturing. The effect of DREE so far has been the subsidization of inefficiency.

But the main dissatisfaction registered so far by the Atlantic provinces Economic Council and the Atlantic Council.

They complain that with all the bureaucracy and 'politics' of DREE, grant money has dropped from 33 per cent to an insignificant amount. They point out that the large corporations are capital-intensive. Therefore, they encourage private profits from labour-intensive. Therefore, they encourage private profits from labour-intensive rather than employment development.

Typical of the government's subsidization of Michelin which received loans of $88.97 million from the Scotia governments.

The only externally - commensurate conclusion of DREE confirms this point: "Movement of local capital in Canada is minimal, and so produce few changes in respect to project size, or technology used. The incentive grants do not influence any significant manner and to be windfall gains."

So it's not really surprising that Canada gave away over $200 million in defence contractors over the past 80 per cent of these grants to multinationals.

The state's half-hearted combatting regional disparities is not making any progress in such a way that the government must not only subsidize a region for a period of time, but it must also maintain a whole network of supporting social industries and a technical infrastructure.

Such a commitment can be taxing the high profits of corporations for a period of time. But this hasn't been the course would risk disaster for the state and corporations.

"That's the free enterprise system. Liberal and Tory governments are corporate friends are wedded to the relationship. Government encourages corporations and the corporations finance the free enterprise system. They support each other in your pocket"
—NDP leader

Many people believe that the state's sting of our economic system is the excess wealth of the rich to the state could be farther from the truth.

Three-quarters of all sales, and property taxes are regressive. That is, the same amount regardless of income.

Whereas someone earning $10,000 pays an astonishing 60 per cent in taxes, someone earning over $100,000 pays 38 per cent. The only important tax—the federal income tax—comes from the most important sources of wealth and interest from saving.

The overall transfer of income from the complex formula called the G.D.P. represents complete equality and inequality. In 1971 the before-tax income of the top 10 per cent of the population was $42. After all personal tax payments (including social security) the figure is $37—hardly any difference.

The sweep of government policy is a tactic of fighting inflation by creating unemployment, to anti-labor laws, tariffs, subsidies, loopholes, regulatory commissions and judicial structures—operating in the interests of monopoly capital. That the US multinationals and other interests have gained profits from the domination of other economic systems in Canada's.

There has been no "trickle-down" movement. Poverty has increased in Canada over the past decade.

What is particularly frightening is the bureaucracy in Canada, compared to the different social backgrounds of the elite economic class, has not changed the economic structures of capitalism. It has provided the ideological mortar to the individual to capitalism by the universities and welfare programs. Bureaucrats and legislators, in the name of the good of the public, have ideologies and policies of liberalization. They mutate the real problems of capitalism into political vocabulary and practical penetrating substance.

The existence of this situation proves the failure of the liberal-democratic ideal of capitalism.

The unfair state

This smoothing over through a co-optive harmonizing and ideological suasion is best represented by the insidious weaponry of the welfare system. Its chief function is to preserve the status quo while still attracting the idealism of liberal fantasies and illusions.

In the early 1900's, volunteer and charity organizations looked after those, who because of age or handicaps, were incapable of working. The Protestant and frontier ethics were dominant in this era. It was believed that everyone could and should work to support themselves and their families. By the 1920's the burden of supporting old persons was beyond the means of charity organizations and local municipalities, and in 1927, the Canadian federal government adopted a pension plan.

After the depression, widespread unemployment was recognized as inherent in the economic structure and requiring large-scale solutions. The various "social assistance" acts of the next forty years were passed largely in response to the parliamentary pressure of reformists. But they were still financed regressively—the worker paid to a broader understanding of the social and economic causes of their situation.

• The government is not particularly concerned with finding employment for the unskilled or even training them to be skilled. To receive manpower training, one must be able to develop enough skills qualify for an occupation within 52 weeks. This obviously discriminates against the millions of Canadians who have less than a grade eight education.

• The worst part of the welfare plans is the inadequacy of the income and services provided. The rates of physical illness and psychological problems are much higher in these groups of people. The documentation of their maltreatment at the hands of medical and legal institutions portrays an unenviable and exploited human condition.

Warfare on the poor

The function, if not the design of these welfare programs, has served to take the steam out of social unrest by providing a subsistent standard of existence and to co-opt any possible unity of economic system was specifically omitted.

The media are also responsible for perpetuating the myths of poverty. Jerry Goodie, a prominent Toronto advertising executive, testified before the Senate Committee on Poverty in 1968:

"The measure of editorial acceptability becomes 'How does it fit?' or 'Will it interest the affluent?' As a consequence, the mass media increasingly reflect the attitudes and deal with the concepts of the affluent. We don't have mass media, we have classmedia for the upper and middle classes."

Not only do 70 per cent of revenues come from 100 companies, mostly American and supporters of the Liberal and Conservative parties, but the media themselves are owned by only a few powerful interests.

Together, they perpetuate an image of middle-class life which Porter, in the Vertical Mosaic, found only four per cent of all Canadians can actually afford.

Because any radical analysis is denied representation in both the media and the political arena, the grievances of the impoverished and Another example of the results of the welfare system that acts as a band-aid approach to social justice.

a higher percentage of his income for unemployment insurance welfare schemes than the millionaire.

There has never been any indication that the government intended to eliminate poverty. Benefits were never tied to need but only to earnings (as in unemployment insurance) or to minimal subsistence levels (as in welfare payments).

In 1966 the patchwork of social assistance services was organized under the Canadian Assistance Plan. Aside from a slightly improved co-ordination of services, its main new wrinkle was to promise provincial governments that the federal government would match all their social assistance payments with equal federal grants. Of course, the poorer provinces who need the welfare subsidies most could least afford to allocate money in that area.

The types of problems that exist with the present welfare system include:

• The bureaucratic structure of the programs often provides an incentive not to work. In five provinces, the minimum wage is lower than welfare payments, and in all provinces single mothers who accept work are penalized by cuts in their welfare grants.

The only organization which has comprehensively examined itself, the Winnipeg Welfare Planning Council, declared that it was in a hopeless state of unco-ordinated duplication of services, fostering inefficient and dehumanizing management.

• The administrative bureaucracy has very little understanding of the particular problems of the poor and often perpetuates the myth that the poor are essentially responsible for their own problems.

Appeal boards and bureaucrats are mainly middle-class professionals who live in the suburbs.

The poor are usually dehumanized and degraded—simply given their monthly handouts, and not offered the information required to come exploited workers and unemployed. The image portrayed by the media of the welfare recipient as a 'chiseler' polarizes the low-wage workers against the welfare recipients.

When welfare grants rather than corporate scandals are highlighted by the media, it is natural that someone who can barely afford the deductions for social assistance programs, who is not entitled to the free drugs and services received by welfare recipients, will become angry at those on welfare and blame them for his/her deprived economic condition.

There are similar frictions between Canadian workers and immigrants, mainly in the low-wage industries, since Canadians often perceived that the latter steal their jobs.

And students are the most hated, because of all groups, they are given the sweetest bribes.

As students are most articulate about the nature of their oppression, and most prone to radical action, the government attempts to ensure that their unrest does not transform itself into political activity. Most of the two per cent of welfare 'chiselers' are students whom the government deliberately leaves alone. The government's Committee of Youth affirmed that the same reasons operated in the establishing of OFY: "For it was not unemployment per se which was seen as creating social unrest but rather inactivity and non-participation in general."

Meanwhile the government spends much of its energies ensuring that the true nature of exploitation is not revealed and that its fundamental relation to economic structures is mystified.

In 1965, the government set up a special planning secretariat to investigate poverty.

In 1966 it was disbanded and in 1968 the Senate established a committee in order to investigate the sources of poverty. In 1971, all evidence linking poverty to the capitalist powerless are framed and illusorily solved by those politicians that corporations can afford to buy.

The "liberal class", if you will, composed of professionals in the therapy and rehabilitation business, welfare administrators, government bureaucrats, doctors, dentists, lawyers, and academics are engaged in the repair of the more damaging of capitalism's consequences. They "fix" people up so that they can survive a while longer and, if made "healthy", will competently rejoin the "rat-race".

Such persons form the substance and ethos of the middle-class.

The liberal may correctly see that capitalism distorts human potential and dignity. But, because he imagines that man's experience and social relations can be separated from his economic activity, the liberal surrenders the possibility of developing a critique of human experience and social relations under capitalism.

A liberal forsakes any investigation into man's nature and therefore easily capitulates to the dynamic of capitalism which promises, though rarely delivers, an ever-increasing material abundance.

Although in the pitfalls of his soul he may vaguely sense the dead-end of such acceptance, he has developed no theory to counter this temptation. He is left with no choice but to accede to the apparently logical demands of capitalism—albeit administered in a kinder and more sensitive fashion.

Liberal ideology hides from itself the very economic foundations upon which it is dependent and from which it grows. The extent to which the structures of capitalism dominate the vocabulary in which problems and solutions are posed, are typically lost on liberals. The liberal fails to grasp the very ideological structures by which capitalism finally seduces him and conceals its deadly workings. In failing to penetrate this the liberal employs his ideas and self in the arsenal of capitalist weaponry.

American profs ponder president's predicament

By LORNE SLOTNICK

It was standing room only in a Sidney Smith lecture hall yesterday as two high-powered American profs teaching at U of T slugged it out on the question of Richard Nixon's possible impeachment.

Historian Bill Berman called the Watergate scandal the "culmination of many years of historical rot" and unequivocally urged Nixon's impeachment in order to "clarify the situation."

"Nixon is no longer believable," he shouted. "He can't even sell a used tape to Judge Sirica." The audience of 300 loved it.

Political scientist Walter Berns was more sober in his presentation, in contrast to what he obviously felt was an intemperate and irrational outburst by Berman.

Known as a conservative, Berns nevertheless pointed out that "I don't like Nixon either." He urged careful consideration of whether there actually were grounds for removing Nixon from office, and what effect such an event would have on the US and the world.

After enumerating the issues involved, he concluded that the "present situation can't go on... I hope he resigns." He said he would like to see a delegation possibly headed by Senator Barry Goldwater, whom he termed "not bright but honest," to inform Nixon that he should resign.

"If in one week he can't recoup support, he has to go," he said sadly.

Berman, however, showed no mercy toward Nixon, while contending that he came "to wash the American flag, not burn it." He argued that the political culture of a too-strong presidency was established during the Cold war, in which Nixon "thrived like a virus."

"Without the Cold War, Nixon was nothing. With it, he's everything," he screamed.

Since Nixon's landslide victory a year ago today, "millions of Archie Bunkers have realized they've been conned and had," but Berman called Congress "too supine, too docile, too subservient" until now to impeach Nixon.

He listed several grounds for impeachment, including the White House "plumbers group", secret wiretappings, and secret bombing of Cambodia and Laos in 1969 and 1970. Berns, however, argued that none of these constituted the "high crimes and misdemeanors" necessary for impeachment according to the constitution.

Referring to Lyndon Johnson's appraisal of vice-president-designate Gerald Ford — that Ford couldn't chew gum and walk at the same time — Berman commented that this was a "fine sensibility" after Nixon's "leading us down to a police state."

"Ford may be a mediocrity, but he is not Nixon," yelled Berman. But Berns seemed to feel that even Nixon was preferable to Ford. He called Ford "impeachment insurance" for Nixon.

Berns argued that "we live in a terrible time when presidential leadership is needed," to handle for example, the Middle East war. Even though Nixon has not committed any "high crimes and misdemeanors," he has "lost the confidence of even Republicans," and so cannot continue.

UFW negotiates with chains

By MARILYN EMERSON

The United Farm Workers' boycott on California grapes continues while UFW representatives negotiate with various grocery stores in Toronto to determine which ones are to be boycotted Saturday.

Of the supermarket chains invited to Friday's UFW meeting called by Mayor David Crombie only Miracle Mart (a subsidiary of IGA) and Loblaw's were represented.

A&P, Oshawa Wholesale and Dominion were invited but representatives did not attend.

The Loblaw's representative said the company objected to the UFW boycott on the grounds that the UFW did not have the support of the people nor did it represent the people. "Let the customers decide," was his suggestion on the issue.

There was no commitment to action by either supermarket representative, but the Loblaw's representative threatened to use an injunction if picketing is begun against the company. "Secondary boycotts are illegal," he contended.

Following a demonstration two years ago against a Darrigo grocery store on St. Clair Avenue West carrying non-union grapes, Darrigo's won a permanent court injunction forbidding any persons from picketing any Darrigo store at any time in the future. This injunction still stands.

While the legal position of UFW is being determined by their lawyers, UFW field workers are directing their efforts toward Saturday's demonstration.

UFW representative Lupe Gamboa said their efforts so far have been "tremendously successful." Hundreds of people have offered their names in support of the boycott.

Acting on this success, the UFW has designated five Toronto locations for mass meetings on Saturday. Supporters will gather at these locations to receive instructions to picket from their UFW representatives.

Students 'unaware of dept. structure'

UC French Union wants to go campus-wide

By MARINA STRAUSS

In response to students' increasing interest in representation in the decision-making of the Combined French Department, the University College French Course Union is hoping to expand to a cross-campus body.

The need to form a strong, central union stems from "students' lack of awareness of the structure of their department," explained UC union president Christine Sinclair.

The department's general committee, which holds final authority on all curriculum matters, allots 30 of its 180 seats to students, the remainder going to teaching staff.

"At present, only 18 of the 30 committee seats are filled," Sinclair admitted. Victoria College mustered up six representatives, UC leads with 12, but Trinity and St. Michael's Colleges remain unrepresented.

Students from colleges other than UC have no course unions, and therefore no base from which to find representatives for department committees.

A proposal to tighten up requirements for specialization and co-specialization in French will soon be on the general committee's agenda.

The recommendation, among other things, would increase to 12 from 10 the number of courses required for specialization and would make some independent research mandatory. It would increase to 8 from 7 the number of courses required for co-specialization.

"Students should be aware of such proposals and prepared to innovate changes of their own into the department," Sinclair stressed. "The communication among students, especially between colleges, is nil."

"Students in the French Department aren't even doing their own course evaluations," she added. The department's course committee, a 16-member body with three students on it, is presently responsible for the evaluations.

"We have such a small voice as it is in the running of the department. If we want to ever get more representation, we've got to show we can organize an effective student union."

Every section of each English course sends a representative to the English Course Union. "We might seriously consider this stage," Sinclair said.

The Combined French Department recently submitted a response to President John Evans to his "bomb-shell" working paper which proposes creation of university departments for each "college" subject.

The department, although willing to see a centralized structure, "wants to see certain guarantees, a form of checks and balances" instituted into Evans' proposal, department chairman E. A. Walker said.

"We do agree that salaries should be standardized from one college to another, and we're virtually certain there are now discrepancies in work loads," Walker claimed.

The department insists that "all colleges be subject to the same means and forms of financing."

"Students could be very much affected by a new centralized structure," Sinclair said.

Because of budget freezes, the colleges have made no new appointments in the last three years, outside a few replacements. Trinity College, which is in very tight financial straits, now has only seven full-time professors, down from nine three years ago.

The colleges now have full control of hiring, tenure, salaries, and financing. Each college receives money from the university based on the number of students in it.

Evans' proposed structure would shift these responsibilities to a central department. It would eliminate money being allocated according to head counts in the colleges.

The president's working paper presented last month proposes cross-appointments between the colleges.

"Students could benefit greatly from such an increase of resources available to them," Sinclair noted.

The main divergence from Evans' proposals is the Combined French Departments' insistence on electing its own chairman.

The president's paper suggests that a chairman be appointed according to the Haist Rules whereby a body composed of the dean of the arts and science faculty, administrators, two members of the department and two members of another department would make the appointment.

The Combined French Department recommends also that the colleges, the dean, and the department itself each have veto power over appointments. The president proposes the department control all appointments.

The French Student Union is holding its organizational meeting tomorrow and will discuss issues facing students taking French courses.

50 Riverdale residents have high lead levels

By ANDREW FALUDY

Fifty people in the Riverdale area have dangerously high levels of lead in their blood, according to Dallard Runge, a community organizer who has been making inquiries into the pollution caused by the Canada Metals plant at Eastern Avenue and Leslie Street.

Previously, three area residents with high lead levels in their blood were admitted to hospital.

As a result, a stop-work order was issued by the provincial ministry of the environment October 27. But only three days later this order was overturned by the Ontario Supreme Court, and Canada Metals started production again immediately.

The stop work order was reversed because Mr. Justice D.A. Keith said that the high lead levels in three of the 720 people tested did not justify closing the plant.

Ontario does not have a standard which says what dangerous levels of lead pollution in blood are.

The Environment Protection Act does stipulate that if the level of lead in the air exceeds 15 micrograms per cubic metre, this constitutes a hazard.

By comparison, Illinois standards do not permit the emission of more than one and a half micrograms per cubic metre.

Runge claims the Ontario standard is not high enough.

"There are 50 people with more than 40 milligrams per millilitre of lead in their blood, yet in three years the lead content in the air has never exceeded three micrograms per cubic meter," he said.

"The Ontario standards are too high because industry can easily meet them most of the time."

Runge argues the 50 people with lead levels in their blood of higher than 40 milligrams per millilitre may be in danger.

His argument has been substantiated in part by the opinion of Dr. Bertrand Carnow, the director of occupational and environmental medicine at the University of Illinois.

Dr. Carnow claims that "neurological damage can result from levels as low as 45 or 50 micrograms."

He says it is "an insidious problem" because "exposure to lower levels over a period of time is more dangerous than exposure to a high level just once."

Dr. Henrietta Sachs, whose evidence in court was largely responsible for the quashing of the stop-work order does not share Dr. Carnow's views.

When asked at the hearing whether she knew of any single case of blood lead poisoning anywhere in the world she replied: "No clinical evidence of lead poisoning has been found."

Dr. Carnow's comment at the hearing on this was simply: "She is lying."

Runge is indignant that in spite of the profusion of experts in Toronto at the time of the hearing (he named Dr. J. Parkinson, Dr. J.W. Mitchell and Dr. G.W.O. Moss), only Dr. Sachs was consulted.

Neither is he satisfied that the measures now being taken to curb the pollution caused by the plant are adequate.

Under the control order issued by the ministry of the environment, the company must install a filter to control emissions from the plant's blast furnaces by February of next year.

Lead spewer not even Canadian

Canada Metals Company Ltd. whose east-end Riverdale plant has caused citizen concern about lead levels is not all that Canadian.

Of the company's nine-man board of directors, three live in the United States. The remaining six are divided between Toronto and Vancouver.

The company itself is owned by Cominco Ltd, a multinational lead and zinc firm, and by NL Industries Ltd., a New York-based firm.

Tories torn on parity

Students should have some say in University decisions but student-staff parity would be like "letting the lunatics run the asylum." So said one of the nameless multitude (15 persons) that attended last night's policy meeting of the U of T Progressive Conservative Club.

The U of T PCC resolved that it "doesn't support staff-student parity on staffing and governing committees of the university". The resolution went through by the incredibly narrow margin of 13 - 1.

The person who voted against the motion was concerned about the plight of Stephen Salaff, the part-time math instructor who was fired last year despite the unanimous protests of his students. In putting forward the debarrier PC response to such doubting of the "Canadian System", a supporter of the motion blurted out: "People get fired every day."

As one PC put it: "It comes down to the question of who you trust more, The Faculty or the students?" According to the progressive logic of the Tories, students are not that interested in student government, thus the "part-timers" who "hang around Sid Smith, The Varsity and SAC" would take over.

"Faculty, on the other hand, tend to be more conservative". Get it?

However, one quick wit was not going to allow the meeting to degenerate into meaningless debate. As he put it "I haven't been overly screwed by anything in my three years here, things should stay the same."

For fells Knox in lacrosse Interfac hockey starts play

By MICHAEL ONIONS

Second Division Lacrosse action saw a powerful For team swamp Knox, 7-1, in their sudden-death semi-final. For now advances to meet Trin in the final next Wednesday with both teams undefeated to date.

The first quarter opened with For launching a quick attack, setting the tone for their play throughout the game. Knox's return attack typified their style during the game. Slow to break, Knox was hesitant to shoot, trying always to work in a little too close to the For goal.

They ran into the solid defensive wall that For threw at them. For's fast-breaking team employed floor-length passes to their advantage, clicking early for a goal by Hosick with only a minute and a half gone in the game.

Hosick added his second just over a minute later, on another quick break for a pass from the corner. Knox played well under pressure as they incurred two successive penalties, almost holding off the For attack, but Hosick completed the hat-trick to end the quarter, Hosick 3-Knox 0.

Knox surged to life at the start of the second quarter. A penalty to For gave Knox a good chance to get on the scoreboard, but For managed to maintain their excellent defence and emerged unscathed.

The second half opened with a fierce onslaught by the For team, forcing Knox goalie Cathrae to some excellent saves to hold Knox in the game. He had no chance, however, on the bullet shot from Mann which gave For a 4-0 lead. Knox finally got one past For goalie Paradiso, as a shot by Benn rebounded and deflected into the net off the For goalie. Knox finished the period tying as they didn't have the bench strength of For.

For's fifth goal, only nine seconds into the last quarter put the last nail into Knox's coffin. White scoring. For maintained a steady attack, Mann ringing one shot off the goalpost but scoring his second goals shortly after. Marshall completed the scoring with just over a minute left to play.

Despite the lop sided score, the game appeared much closer. Neither team was able to control play long enough to bombard the other. Knox's style of working close to the goal for its scoring chances was unable to cope with the stronger For defence which blocked numerous passes and shots.

HOCKEY

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
The seventy-fifth annual pursuit of the Jennings Cup began last week with over seventeen Interfac teams jockeying for position.

sportalk

Toronto women fencers performed well against highly qualified opposition on Saturday in the St. Jamestown Individual Open. Anne Stokes, Yoko Ode and Jane Scotchmer advanced to the finals, with Yoko Ode finishing second.

Benson Building hosts a fencing tournament and a synchronized swim meet on the weekend of the 23rd.

A co-ed interfac cross country meet, for the tough ones among us, hits the campus (literally) tomorrow. Men go 4000 metres and the women 2000, with all entries accepted at the starting line on the back campus. For the uninitiated, there are about 1500 metres in a mile.

The men's fall interfac swim meet will be held on November 14.

Laurier and Ottawa play this Saturday for the Yates Cup.

Defending champions SMC steamrolled over Erindale 0-0 and were severely reprimanded by Vic 1-0.

Sr. Eng fell afoul of the Law 5-3 and as punishment were drawn and quartered by PHE 5-2. The jocks then drew with Vic (the resulting sketch looked like '1-1' but we're not art critics).

In another first division game, Erin flouted the Law 9-6. Chicken Little scored for Law before he noticed the sky was falling.

Elsewhere in Interfac, fanatic puritans put the Knox on Music 5-0. Music was eventually played again by the capitalists from Management Studies but they shouldn't have, losing 9-3.

Forestry lumbered by Trin 2-1 and then learned Fac of Ed a thing or three, beating them 3-1.

New in the yellow put UC in the red 6-0; those suave Grads were Dented 6-1; Jr. Eng piped down PHE B 2-1 while Trin lost again 4-2 to Vic II.

The UC and Med's A contest was cancelled. (The game report said "The icescraper broke with less than thirty minutes to go" but it did not say which side it was playing for at the time.)

Law II arrested Scar II's development 5-2; the druggists organically Pharmed Knox 5-2 while Meds left a permanent Scar 2-1 which might require further surgery. New I flattened UC 17-1 with New's Gollish getting a penalty for being too many men on the ice.

In matches played this week, Dents froze Scar's big guns and drilled them 4-1. Later they extracted a 1-0 win from New.

After clobbering Trin 5-0, SMC B was detained after school by the Fac of Ed and strapped 6-0.

No-one is above the law this year as Law I administered justice to SMC 8-0 and in the lower courts Law II did the same to Vic II (5-0) and New II (9'0).

Grads I bedevilled Vic 4-0 but in turn Jr. Eng bedizened Grads II 10-0. (If they hadn't introduced the New Programme this never would have happened.)

Pharm dispensed an 8-0 defeat to Management Studies.

This week the intrepid Miss Boyd will unleash over eighty-five wide-eyed, flesh-eating mobs (hereafter to be known as 'Intermediate Teams'). From time to time, Varsity Sports will publish reports of their bestial activities to keep the decent citizenry informed. In the meantime, if you should be bitten by one of them, see your doctor immediately.

Gnus edge Trinity, Jr Eng, doctors enter soccer finals

FOOTBALL
By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Trin played well over their heads but that still wasn't tall enough to prevent New from winning 9-6 in the Division II semi-finals played at Varsity Stadium yesterday.

A strong cold wind and New's lethargic scoring appetite almost led to a big upset but a controversial interference call with only a minute and a half remaining in the game set up Newfelt's game-winning TD for New.

In the first quarter, Trin locked up New in its own end and donated the key to charity. A bad New punt deposited Trin on the New 28 and two running plays by Ferris and Bagnall moved them down to the 2. On the next play, Poulos crashed over on a fine second effort to propel Trin into a 6-0 lead. (The convert was missed.)

Both teams sawed away at each other until late in the second quarter when New fumbled a punt at their 21 and Trin's Hamilton fell on the loose ball like a jewel thief. Trin QB Wright moved his team down to the 4. With only 28 seconds in the half left Trin gambled on a third down instead of kicking a field-goal and the ball squirted away from Poulos in the endzone. In retrospect, three points then might have given Trin an almost insurmountable 9-0 lead.

Down only 6-0 in the third quarter, New began to break out of captivity. They ground down to the Trin 35 and scored a single when a field-goal attempt went wide.

With only 4:53 left, another New drive was halted by a tiring Trin defence. Saikely missed the subsequent field-goal attempt from the 21 which Trin conceded for the single point.

Trin then started at their own 20 but couldn't go anywhere. A heavy rush on the kicker forced a hurried short punt which New downed at midfield with 2:04 remaining. A roughing penalty against Trin moved New down to the 35.

On the next play a long pass was overthrown but a linesman ruled pass interference. While Trin players and supporters howled and swore, on the sidelines, New scrimmaged at the Trin 5 and Newfelt slipped easily past the demoralized defence for the go-ahead TD.

Trin tried to mount a drive with a minute left but New suffocated them on another third down gamble.

The Mulock Cup playoffs continue today at 2:00 in Varsity Arena. Vic meets SMC with the winner meeting PHE for the championship next week. On Thursday, in a Division II playoff, UC and Meds play at 2:00 in Varsity with New playing that winner, also next week.

In the howling freezing wind Jr Engineering used their superior positional skills to hammer PHE 7-2 in second division semi-final play.

Feiler and Moy counted to give the plumbers an early lead with the wind in their favor. When the goalie failed to collect a long post lob Lam chipped it over his head to make it 3-0.

PHE refused to give up and countered with headers from Gueli and Dotzko. Dotzko's goal, five minutes into the second half, seemed to fire Eng because they came roaring back against the wind for three fast goals.

Venere put away a shot from a diseased free kick while PHE's goalie stood and watched. Lam found a free ball at centre and lammed for the goal where he found lots to shoot at. Feiler ended the flurry with a beautiful long shot high in the corner.

PHE got a few chances, but their fate was already decided. Milner finished it off late in the game and the plumbers advanced to the finals.

The other semi-final featured the second-division leaders against a Trinity A team wracked by injuries and class-room absences. The 5-1 final score for Meds was hardly surprising.

Blusys opened the scoring for the doctors, heading in a high cross. Sasson followed 10 minutes later, blasting home a push from George. Boyd made it 3-0 when he lucked out on a missed penalty kick by picking up the rebound and putting it home off defender Parker.

Trinity took the wind in the second half, but it was not enough. Parker missed a penalty kick and then made it back when he found the top corner on a powerful free kick from thirty yards.

That was it for the red and black as sturdy defence kept them out. Blake picked up two garbage goals for insurance. The first was a bad ref's call, the second an easy tap in when Trin goalie Williams, playing well all game, misjudged a high ball and it bounced free.

In postponed first division regular season games, Engineers sneaked into first by tying Erindale 1-1 on Saturday and then shutting them out 2-0 on Monday.

Eng I defeated Trin A 4-0 on Friday with Cherniak scoring the unconverted try for them.

The lawyers finally turned up for a game on Monday (although only six made it). However, it might have been better had they remained in the courts for Eng I took them 6-3.

Martin Reader scored the try and Cherniak converted. Gourlay dropped-kicked a penalty through the up-rights for Law.

Trin A beat the jocks 6-0 on Monday. A questionable placing of a penalty allowed Bell to ring up a try, converted by Knowles. PHE showed improved style over previous games, but failed to score.

The plush Robarts Library (above) is no heaven to work in. Starting salary is $2.47 an hour.

Strike considered by Robarts workers as negotiations stall

By MARILYN EMERSON

Workers at the Robarts Library are frustrated with the lack of progress in their negotiations for a new contract with the university to the point where strike action is being considered.

"There is more talk now than at any time in the past about strike action," said library worker Tom Bribresco, President of the executive committee for the library union, Local 1230 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE). Union members are frustrated with the slowness of action from the library management which has not yet made any counter-proposals on money matters.

Under the present contract, starting salary for library workers is $4,664 per year or $88 per week—$2.47 an hour during the academic session and $2.66 an hour during the summer when work hours are shorter.

Many of the library workers are university graduates with B.A.'s and M.A.'s.

The revised minimum wage scales proposed by the Ontario ministry of labor and changed under the Employment Standards Act are $2 an hour effective January 1.

The minimum construction rate is to be $2.25 an hour.

The union executive committee has proposed a 15 per cent wage increase as the minimum wage demand possible. Bribresco said: "A 15 per cent wage increase now would only put the workers into a buying power position effective last year."

University president John Evans in a confidential report has recommended the university reduce its debt by restricting the rate of wage increases given to university employees in the fiscal years 1975-76 and 1976-77.

A five-week library strike at Sir George Williams University won the SGWU library union a new contract in which all full-time library workers will be receiving at least $100 weekly.

The university library workers' union wants a cost of living formula, escalator clause, in the new contract.

Bribresco said the escalator clause is necessary to "keep the gains of wage increase from eroding as a result of inflation."

The confidential Evans report recommending restrictions in wage increases, if implemented, would become effective in April, 1975, the same year the library workers' contract will be due for renewal.

The Evans report would defeat an escalator clause such as that demanded by the library workers and reduce the rate of wage increases below their current rate until 1977. The library workers averaged a seven per cent a year increase in their last two-year contract.

Another key demand being made by the union is a comprehensive health plan.

Under the present contract each employee is entitled to one and a quarter days per month sick leave.

Chief steward of the executive committee Judy Darcy said: "No pay is given to an employee absent for illness who has not 'saved up' time."

"The only recourse for such an employee," she said, "is to collect unemployment insurance."

"Only after a period of three months illness does a 'long term plan' for salary provision come into effect."

This plan is not retroactive. The plan has a time limit and a complicated wage distribution clause.

Many union members are arguing in favor of a "short term disability plan", whereby an employee would receive pay for up to 15 weeks in case of serious illness or accident.

Further to health provisions, Bribresco said the Robarts Library "has two health (rest) rooms. In each room there is a bed and a first aid kit."

"Over the past few years many workers in the library have suffered from long term illness and in two cases, death has occurred on the job."

Bribresco suggested that "these people might have been saved if the library premises were equipped with the proper first aid material and staff."

Secretary for the executive committee, Walter Brooker, complained about the use of mahogany throughout the Robarts Library. Brooker questioned the wisdom of management on budget distribution as he pointed to a mahogany book carrier.

The executive committee personnel strongly emphasises the fact that "bad working conditions equals bad service. A shortage of staff equals longer delays in service."

Darcy expressed concern over the fact that the bad working conditions in the library were "having a negative effect on the workers."

The library union contract expired July 1. Since then negotiations between union and management have yielded no results.

Bribresco pointed out, "The complaints of the workers have existed since the opening of the Robarts. As yet none of these complaints has been satisfied."

A recent television broadcast on the Robarts Library included an interview with chief librarian R.H. Blackburn. Darcy reported Blackburn's reply to complaints about the library where Blackburn said: "You can't please everyone."

Union executive committee personnel uniformly agree their union complaints are specific and express the opinion of a large number of workers.

Last week a new executive committee was elected by union members. They intend to lead a "militant and unified membership to improve conditions."

Bribresco said he hopes for a cross campus workers union. He indicated recent cross-campus cut backs as a good cause for university workers coming together in one union.

"The interests of the students and workers coincide," he said. "Better conditions equal better service."

To further their aims the executive committee personnel calls for "increased contact with other campus groups including workers, professionals and students."

Province waffles on student power

By JANE WATERSTON

The provincial government will not take a stand on the current U of T debate over student participation on tenure and staffing committees, says Dr. Douglas T. Wright, executive assistant to Social Development and Housing Minister Robert Welch.

Asked if the province endorses the student side of the tenure controversy, Wright said Wednesday the government's position has been established by the U of T Act.

The U of T Act provides for minority student participation on the governing council (eight out of 50 members), and the Governing Council establishes internal university policies. Wright said the government does recognize this necessity and legitimacy of student participation on decision making bodies.

However, on the tenure issue, Wright said it is an internal problem, and the government will not get involved no matter the strength of its views on student participation. Since Queen's Park is equally committed to its policy of university autonomy, it will not take sides in the debate.

Wright made these comments after delivering a speech prepared by Robert Welch at a noon-hour session of the Ontario Youth Secretariat sponsored Forum on Youth.

In contrast to Dr. Wright's hands-off policy, the text of the speech included the following plugs for "heightened student involvement".

"On the whole young people are not given an active or credible role in the social planning process in its design stages, and we are undoubtedly missing out on the use of some exceptional talent and energy which could be directed in this area."

"We should strengthen the role of student government so that student representatives have a say in what goes on in their schools beyond deciding the theme for the annual dance or buying the usual athletic trophies."

"The tremendous energies which university students and others expend on studying injustices both within and outside our society speaks highly of their commitment to ideals and principles which all of us espouse, but which too often get buried in the morass of administration and paperwork."

Caucus seeks vote on staff issues

The Faculty Reform Caucus has taken the first step in an attempt to force a vote by all Faculty Association members on the issue of who will be allowed to make decisions about tenure and staffing.

The caucus, which met Wednesday for the first time in almost a year, is seeking a general meeting of the association to discuss the issue.

Caucus members will be able to get the issue on the association's agenda if they can muster 50 signatures for a petition requesting such action.

The caucus hopes the issue will be put to a vote if such a meeting is held.

The association's executive has endorsed a recommendation by the Forster Task force report on academic affairs that students be barred from participation in staffing decisions.

This was one of four alternatives suggested by the task force. The task force report stated that members could not decide about the other three suggested alternatives.

Bill Nelson, head of the association, said in an interview that some association members apparently have no objection to student participation.

However, the association does not mention the word "student" in its comments on the Forster report.

Nelson said a small number of those who put together the position paper have no "personal" objection to students. But the position paper contains no mention of a minority position.

The reform caucus has not committed itself to a position on student representation. Instead, it wants further discussion of the broader issue of how decision-making bodies should be comprised.

Caucus members also created a new steering committee which will serve as its executive body. Its three student members include two SAC officials: President Bob Anderson and Services Commissioner Seymour Kanowitch. It also includes Gord Barnes, student representative on the Governing Council.

The caucus was formed in 1971 during the parity dispute.

A caucus member described the reform group's stance last year as one of non-confrontation. However, he said, this might change as the caucus takes a more active role in decision-making.

In a front-page story on Wednesday, we referred to Seymour Kanowitch as SAC vice-president. Kanowitch, among others, had tried to stop a meeting of the Academic Affairs committee on Tuesday in an effort to gain formation of a parity subcommittee to study hiring, firing and tenure.

Although he may be the rising star of U of T politics, Kanowitch still only holds the lowly job of SAC Services Commissioner. In reality, the SAC vice-presidents are Mike Scott and Stephen Moses.

Food Sci students to confront Gov Council

By BOB BETTSON

The Food Science Student Society is heading toward a confrontation with the Governing Council in its continuing fight to prevent the phasing out of the faculty.

Society president Irene Miller says that the society is planning a demonstration at the Governing Council meeting on November 22. The society is also circulating a petition to demonstrate student and faculty support for the maintenance of the faculty.

Though Miller said that she "doesn't believe in maintaining the status quo in the faculty", she criticized the administration plan to phase out the faculty in favor of a resource centre.

"The administration has no model for the orphan child it proposes to set up. The orphan child is a combination of the present Department of Nutrition in the Hygiene Department and the present Food Sciences Faculty."

She added that "we are losing our status and being stripped of the textiles courses." She charged that "the administration wishes to get rid of Food Sciences because it has a 'bad' name."

"This seems to be their sole reason for getting rid of the faculty," she said. "The administration would like to see a greater emphasis on pure research, not research that is socially relevant."

Miller criticized the administration for leaving students out of decision-making procedures for the last four years while the faculty has been under review.

"The first time they solicited student opinion this year was October when I was asked to submit a paper".

The SAC executive decided Wednesday to support Miller's demands that Food Sciences be maintained as a faculty. The other demands are that a new dean be appointed, that adequate financial resources be provided for research and teaching in the faculty, and that a parity staff-student committee be set up within the faculty to define the new directions in which the faculty should go.

For the last few years the administration has been reviewing the fate of the faculty with a series of small committees without significant student representation.

And while Miller agrees that duplication of resources and co-operation with other faculties are problems, she thinks that they can be solved within the present faculty.

Miller said that many of the problems of Food Sciences are the same as in other faculties across the campus.

Miller criticized the administration plan for failing "to create a new model. They say that God created the world in seven days but the administration hasn't got any plans."

She charged that the administration's allegations that professors in food sciences were not doing enough research is "pretty filthy."

"The faculty members have an enormous teaching load and the administration will not hire any new professors."

Another aspect of the battle is what Miller calls the "U of T's strong male chauvinist bias." The Faculty of Food Science is mainly made up of women, she explained, and it was the first science faculty for women. She feels that U of T wants to concentrate on the high status male-dominated professional faculties such as Law, Medicine, Engineering and Dentistry."

Fund LIP grants provinces told

By JANE WATERSTON and SUZANNE ROUNTHWAITE

Provincial and territorial governments are not only capable of, but morally obliged to pick up funding of LIP and OFY grants once they expire, an official of the secretary of state's department told a gathering of provincial officials Wednesday.

R.H. Andras, strategic planner for youth programs, was replying to a Quebec delegate who had asked if mechanisms capable of assuming responsibility for the projects once federal funding ends actually do exist at the provincial level. R.H. Andras is the son of Robert Andras, minister of manpower and immigration.

This was only one of the problems brought to the attention of the 27 government officials who have come to Toronto to attend the Forum on Youth, a three-day conference sponsored by the Ontario youth secretariat.

The difficulties arising at both the provincial and federal levels from the OFY and LIP programs were the focus of the afternoon's panel discussion.

Delegates agreed that the screening process used to select the recipients of the grants tends to favor an educated and articulate section of Canadian youth, effectively barring any group with excellent ideas but no selling ability.

They also recognized that although OFY grants are primarily directed toward the 16-25 year age group, it is often valuable to have an older staff member on the project. Current government policy, however, does not allow for such a case.

The undesirable effects of the limited duration of the government funds were also considered.

Among these are the difficulty of assimilating a worthwhile project into existing community structures, the drop in activity and loss of interest that often occurs within groups during the last month of their grants, and the frustration at a grant's end, felt by those who are receiving and depending on the services offered.

Several of those who spoke also mentioned the insufficient time for final preparations on the projects which results from the government policy of notifying the successful groups only a few weeks before the expected starting date.

A delegate from the Northwest Territories stressed that in an area where communications are primitive, it is virtually impossible to notify the groups chosen, and to have them mobilized within a matter of days, as the federal government seems to expect.

The delegates endorsed the idea that selection and supervision of the grants should take place largely at a local level, and that Ottawa should be open to advice and suggestion.

However, it was admitted that the community advisory boards composed of "interested" citizens which have been created as a means of achieving this communication are badly coordinated and thus ineffective.

The session ended on a more optimistic note. Delegates resolved to stage yet another meeting in which they would draw up concrete resolutions containing their suggestions to the federal government.

As the conference broke up to head for the pre-dinner bar, Dr. David Boswell, an official from P.E.I.'s department of education who had served as chairman of the meeting, was overheard expressing his puzzlement over the lack of attendance at the conference of high level government officials.

No flowers, LIP wilts

By SUZANNE ROUNTHWAITE

Working on a LIP project can be frustrating if you live in the Northwest Territories. Dr. E. Lidster of the Interdepartmental Committee on Youth in Yellowknife told delegates to the Forum on Youth.

Dr. Lidster, cited the case of a group of Eskimo women who had received a grant to make their own clothes rather than rely on the drab Hudson's Bay fare.

As spring approached, the women were becoming particularly enthusiastic about the possibility of making dyes from local wild flowers to brighten their new clothes.

However, funds were withdrawn on schedule just before the flowers came into bloom and the project ended abruptly without the clothes being dyed.

The grant was not renewed.

TA group seeks wage hike

By DAVID LIPTON

Teaching assistants in the history department have set up a steering committee to coordinate their campaign for an immediate salary increase.

The eight-man committee was established after a meeting yesterday at Sidney Smith Hall, at which about 25 of the department's 70 assistants discussed grievances.

It was decided to formulate a set of specific questions aimed at a variety of problems in the department. These questions will be asked in a telephone survey, beginning today, of all department assistants.

On the basis of responses, a report will be prepared for delivery to another general meeting of department assistants later this month. A revised list of grievances then will be drawn up and forwarded to the chairman of the department by the committee.

Yesterday's meeting was in response to a letter sent out by several assistants concerned about the general plight of student teachers at the U of T.

The letter said faculty members in the history department have received a raise in each of the last four years, while salaries of assistants have remained unchanged during the same period. The letter also noted that assistants carry a large part of the teaching load in the department.

It suggested that perhaps faculty members believed it is easier for the average assistant, who earns $2,000 to absorb food cost increases than it is for a professor who earns $20,000.

Torture ignored as Ottawa backs US Viet policy

By DOUG KELK

Independent journalist Fred Branfman, who has spent the last six years in Indochina, has charged that the Canadian government is bowing to pressure from the United States on the issue of aiding political prisoners in South Vietnam.

Speaking at St. Lawrence Centre on Wednesday night, Branfman told an audience of 60 that while the Canadian Government states it is acting objectively, its refusal to take initiative to help stop atrocities taking place can only be interpreted as support of American policy.

"Governments have to be moved to action," said Branfman, "and only a strong show of force will result in the Canadian government acting on this matter."

Another speaker, Andrew Brewin, NDP MP for Greenwood, who recently returned from a week in Vietnam, is involved with other government officials in presenting a brief to Mitchell Sharp, urging Canadian initiative to help the political prisoners.

"The facts beyond dispute reveal that such cruel treatment of prisoners is taking place," said Brewin. "This is a breach of the human rights charter of the United Nations. As Canada supports this charter, the Canadian Government should be committed to protest in this matter."

Brewin urged Canadians, as people of humanitarian concerns, to express their views in writing to their local MP and Mitchell Sharp.

American funds maintain the police and prison system in South Vietnam. Many of the prisoners represent the "neutralist" element in South Vietnam — Catholic and Buddhist — as the "third force" between the communists and the American-supported regime. Because of the neutralists' group refusal to support the Thieu Government, they are often imprisoned and sometimes killed.

Nguyen Thi Ngoc Thoa, wife of Branfman, stated the plight of Vietnamese children. Her brother has spent years in prison.

Amnesty International quotes a figure of 100,000 political prisoners in South Vietnam as a conservative number.

In a short film presented by the committee, victims of various torture techniques were interviewed. Thousands of prisoners locked in "tiger cages" were permanently paralyzed as their leg muscles were not allowed to function for long periods of time, the film indicated.

Reflecting on his interviews with prisoners who were tortured in South Vietnam, Branfman said he found the spirit of even the permanently injured to be "astounding." He played a tape recording of a prisoner singing a tune which he said reflected the spirit of joy and strength with which these people move forward in the hope of peace, despite great hardship.

Noranda's Zimmerman should check facts

Last Friday The Varsity printed a news story dealing with A. H. Zimmerman, a vice-president and controller of Noranda Mines Ltd. The story connected Zimmerman with both the University Of Toronto Private Support Board and the Canadian government's Export Development Corporation (EDC). We attempted to show that some of the people that influence Canada's foreign policy are also connected to this university; that is, that we can't divorce U of T from the people running it from the outside world.

Yesterday we received a letter from Zimmerman, which we reprint below. Following the letter we show that statements in Zimmerman's letter are not factually correct. (Our information comes from The Financial Post Corporation Service.)

Late yesterday afternoon we talked to Zimmerman about his letter and the information we had discovered about Noranda Mines Ltd. Due to space limitations the substance of that interview cannot appear today but will be printed in Monday's Varsity.

Boy, you sure made my first attendance at a meeting of the Private Support Board a memorable occasion. Never have I had such publicity or even vaguely imagined myself possessed of such power as you credit me. Since you missed a few things and screwed up a couple of others I wanted to write this and help you out.

On a personal basis, you omitted the fact that I played on Varsity football teams with both John Evans and Bill Davis. I've served on two other community service boards with Bill Harris and worked on joint audits with Bill Broadhurst, both PSB members. So you can see that the incest you describe began in the locker room and developed even in charitable causes.

My great imperialist employer, Noranda Mines, operates significantly in no foreign country except as a minority partner. Noranda's only South African activity I've ever heard of is a two man exploration office - which may fit your definition of operating in a big way! The most outrageous thing we've done in Canada of late is to provide summer employment to over 2,000 students all of whom are encouraged to tell us what they think.

So far as the Export Development Corporation is concerned - as you point out, its function is to provide finance and/or insurance for Canadian companies investing or trading abroad. The point is that the companies take the initiative and EDC's job is to keep its money working and flowing to the advantage of Canadian business, so participation is limited to ventures which will likely meet their obligations.

Since my time on the EDC board there have been only two applications presented to it, both of which were approved in the total amount of $7 million. The insurance cover approximately $5 million has been written since 1970. In the same period, the government agency responsible for giving away foreign aid money, the Canadian International Development Agency, has provided about $500,000 of technical assistance to projects in Chile.

Returning to the case of Noranda $4,529,000 was invested of which $4,134,000 was recovered. The property was a marginal situation at best and when we offered to give it to the employees, they refused. This might suggest that even those most knowledgeable and concerned thought it not worth having.

I'm sorry I've lost the only picture of me on my horse with sidearms and whip but if it turns up I hope you'll publish it some day.

A.H. Zimmerman

Adam Zimmerman has stated in the above letter that "My great imperialist employer, Noranda Mines, operates significantly in no foreign country except as a minority partner. Noranda's only South African operation activity I've ever heard of is a two man exploration office - which may fit your definition of operating in a big way!"

Although the South African operation Zimmerman speaks about doesn't exactly fit our definition of "big business", we believe information gained from the Financial Post Corporation Service tells a different story.

As the Financial Post's card says: "Directly and through subsidiaries and associated companies Noranda Mines carries on an integrated mining, smelting, refining, marketing, fabricating, exploration and research business relating principally to the natural resources industry. The operations of the Noranda complex are carried on throughout Canada and in parts of the United States, Mexico, Central America, Argentina, Brazil, Ireland, Sardinia, Spain, Portugal, South Africa, the United Kingdom, and Australia."

Although Noranda's biggest investment lies in developing the Canadian "frontier" from its "metropolis" base in Toronto, the company's subsidiaries also operate producing mines in Nicaragua and Mexico. Furthermore, Noranda is also into the United States in a big way. Noranda and Mead Corporation of Dayton, Ohio, together have 58 per cent controlling interest in British Columbia Forests Products Ltd., "one of the largest secondary industries in Mexico itself.

1972 shipments to North America totalled 279,000 tons compared with 356,000 tons in 1971, while net income for the year was (US) $3,085,000 compared with (US) $1,551,000 in 1971. In 1989 Empresa complied with Mexican law and sold 51 per cent of its 100 per cent interest in Las Cuevas to Mexican citizens for (US) $3,060,000. Noranda received dividends of (US) $3,168,000 from Empresa in 1972.

Noranda also holds a 61 per cent interest in Empresa Minera de El Setentrion, a dividend-paying company which operates a gold mine in Nicaragua, Central America.

For 1972, production revenue amounted to (US) $5,756,000 from treatment of 116,000 tons of ore grading 0.7 ounces gold per ton compared with $3,847,000 from treatment of 119,000 tons grading 0.69 ounces gold per ton in 1971. Net income for 1972 amounted to (US) $2,081,000 compared with $913,000 in 1971. Noranda received dividends of (US) $848,000 from this subsidiary in 1972.

More recently, Noranda Australia Ltd., a wholly-owned subsidiary of Noranda Mines limited has been set up to handle 1972, the Canadian program accounted for 50 per cent, the Australian for 21 per cent and the USA for 16 per cent.

During 1973 exploration projects are being conducted in Canada, the US, Brazil, Argentina, Ireland, Mexico, Portugal, Sardinia, South Africa, Spain, and the United Kingdom.

Noranda's history of development

Noranda was first formed by Ontario incorporation on May 1, 1922. Since then the company has managed to expand, through its various interconnections, virtually world-wide. Some of its most prominent involvements overseas in the past half-century include:

- Compania Minera la India, which operated a producing gold mine in Nicaragua, Central America, from 1938 to suspension in 1956. Noranda held a 64 per cent interest. When the company eventually wound up, Noranda received liquidation payments of $1,815,000 (US) and 121,125 shares (or 60.5 per cent equity) in Empresa Minera de El Setentrion, a gold-producing subsidiary.

- On June 1, 1970, United States Noranda subsidiary Noranda Metal Industries Inc., acquired the F.W. French Tube Co. of Connecticut, engaged in the production of copper and copper alloys.

One of Noranda's Canadian Mines, in the Gaspé keeps right on producing.

integrated producers of forest products in Canada" according to the Financial Post. So the company is helping our southern neighbour to extract Canada's own resources.

Noranda first entered the aluminum business in 1967-68, when the company's wholly-owned US subsidiary, Noranda Inc., acquired ownership of the Pacific Coast Co., which manufactures aluminum building products in Cleveland, Ohio, and Jacksonville, Florida. In 1971, Pacific Coast Co. was merged with Noranda Inc. and the company now carries on its operations as an operating American subsidiary.)

Further expansion into the aluminum field was effected with the formation of Noranda Aluminum Inc., as a Noranda subsidiary. The branch-plant completed construction of an aluminum smelter and related manufacturing facilities near New Madrid, Missouri, in September, 1971.

Noranda's Subsidiaries outside North America

Noranda Mines Ltd. has 75 per cent direct and 89 per cent beneficial interest in Emr Fluorspar Mines Ltd., in Mexico. The company has a producing fluorspar mine near San Luis Potosi, through a 49 per cent owned operating company, Las Cuevas. The mine's output is sold to steel companies throughout North America. Financial Post's report does not indicate whether any of the raw material finds its way to the sales of primary metals and minerals for Noranda and others.

And another subsidiary, Noranda Sales Corporation of Canada, operates in London, England, to handle overseas business. Through this subsidiary Noranda has acquired 50 per cent interest in Rudolf Wolff and Company, a large British metal and trading company and a broker on the London Metal Exchange.

Noranda's Industrial companies

Some of Noranda's industrial, as opposed to extractive, companies are also busy at work outside Canada. Pillar Metal Industries, in Britain, for example, is owned jointly by Noranda and RTZ Pillar Ltd., a subsidiary of Rio-Tinto Zinc Corp. Ltd. This company acts exclusively as a distributor of Noranda's semi-manufactured goods.

Also, Noranda Metal Industries Inc. produces copper tube in a plant at Bellingham, Washington in the United States, and manufactures specialty tubing at its French Tube division in Newton, Connecticut.

Noranda's exploration division continues to expand

Noranda Mines is also active in the exploration of outside properties, directly, through subsidiaries and in partnership with other companies. Some $8.8 million was spent on mineral exploration in 1972 compared with $9.7 million in 1971. Of the amount spent in Noranda's 1972 total income was $592,280,000 and its net income after deductions, $64,333,000. Dividends for the year amounted to $29,056,000 and surplus was $35,277,000. With a previous surplus of $361. million. Noranda's retained earnings amounted to $395,139,000.

Zimmerman's Corporation has connections with Governing Council members

Although Zimmerman mentions in his letter that he's "served on two other community service boards with Bill Harris and worked on joint audits with Bill Broadhurst", he neglected to mention a couple of other facts. The firms of Governing Council members Harris and Mallin Harding (Governing Council chairman) are partners in development with Zimmerman's own Noranda. For example, Governing Council member William B. Harris is the president of Harris and Partners Ltd., a firm responsible for Noranda's previous long-term debt. The debt was outstanding in four and three-quarters sinking fund debentures dated January 2, 1953, and due January 2, 1968. They were retired in full by the maturity date with the entire issue being sold privately by Harris and Partners Ltd.

Also, the trustee for Noranda's present long-term debt is Crown Trust Co., the same company that manages all the university's present housing holdings. governing Council member W.J.D. Lewis is a director. One big happy family. Monday: Zimmerman repiles.

Mackenzie King called 'smart son of a bitch'

By WAYNE ROBERTS

If Reg Whittaker fashioned a biography of William Lyon Mackenzie King in the tradition of classic Canadian historical writing, he said he would title his two volume work: — Mackenzie King; The Young Son Of A Bitch, and King; The Old Son Of A Bitch.

However, Whittaker told his Waffle audience Sunday at OISE: "King was a smart son of a bitch." The Carleton political scientist continued with a veiled slam at the old CCF: "There is infinitely more to be learned from one smart son of a bitch than 1,000 wellmeaning fools."

It was an age when corporate capitalism congealed in Canada, Whittaker said, but the standard view of King as a continentalist mistakes his singular contribution.

Since his opponents were also continentalists, his real contribution was to save capitalism by blunting the struggles of workers and deflecting them in a helpless direction.

If King could not prevent the integration of Canada into the American empire, he argued, it was only because King, like Gerald Ford, "couldn't chew gum and walk at the same time."

King's blueprint for this, Industry and Humanity, was written "in the red-line year of 1919... "when the American branches were not yet a forest."

At a time when working class struggles were at the forefront of social and political thinking, King came forward with his own dialectical synthesis — thesis — antithesis — mystification, he explained.

Industry and Humanity, Whittaker asserted, was not just the work of a "pompous windbag." It was the work of a new breed of technocrats whose lifework was to deform working class consciousness.

Although its corporate logic could be carried forward to make it "the Mein Kampf of Canada," its real service was to rescue corporate capitalism from reaction and win it to small-liberalism.

The debate between free enterprise and state intervention which marked the period was a "phantom debate," he argued. The real debate was over co-optation in the pattern outlined in the U.S. by historians like Koko and Weinstein.

King's ability and strategy were necessary but not sufficient conditions for the success of this policy, Whittaker continued. In the critical juncture of 1919, the working class was unable to counterpose its own culture and consciousness because of the continued cultural and political hegemony of petit-bourgeois reformers, Whittaker said.

The Manitoba Progressives, he charged, were nothing more than "capitalists in a hurry," rebelling against their loss of strategic position in the economy. Their leaders were intent on subordinating and mediating the struggle between capital and labour.

Middle-class Christian reformers wanted to "uplift" the working class and fit them into a petit-bourgeois mould. Both served "a debilitating influence" in the congealing of a separate working class ideology, Whittaker maintained.

In the Thirties, he continued — while the workers were resistant to "democratic co-optation" and the Canadian Labor Congress rejected the government partnership welcomed by its American counterparts — the CCF was there "with its eminently co-optable petit-bourgeois ideology." King saw them, he argued, as a modifying and controlling factor in the labour movement.

Whittaker was more optimistic about the present. Although the NDP are "the legitimate successors to King" with their program of integrating labor into state structures, the working class has frequently shown itself to be more militant than its leadership, he maintained.

"What was missing was a Marxist leadership free from foreign entanglements and middleclass liberalism." The objective conditions of the class struggle are bringing the necessity of that kind of leadership once more to the fore, he concluded.

The lecture was probably a Waffle first for having no significant reference to Americanization in a period which is charted by many writers as crucial in the integration of North American capitalism. His harsh rejection of the CCF heritage is consistent with Waffle moves for an open opposition to the NDP.

Students 'spoiled'

By ELEANOR SIMPSON

In a hard-hitting attack on the education system, the chairman of the board of Bell Canada called for a return to the basics — the three R's and good old-fashioned "education."

Robert Scrivener, speaking before about 60 people at the Ontario Youth Conference, said that universities have to be more nimble in their adaptation to the changing job market.

Scrivener's criticisms of the educational system were well-received as were his comments on modern youth — "Les enfants gates — the spoiled children."

He said he meant the graduating students of post-secondary institutions and universities who had come to expect jobs which involved convenience not hard work.

Canada is "moving to a stage when aged people will attract more attention than youth," Scrivener said because young people had "tarnished their image."

He urged youth advisers to "caution them about the importance of their image in public" as "a small number of students had created a very bad image for youth."

After a steak lunch — complete with seconds — at the provincial government-sponsored conference, Scrivener outlined the key problems in education today.

He said "the traffic jam effect" — the dumping of a lot of fresh, eager, young graduates on the labor market at the same time each year did not make sense.

It was geared to the era when students were needed to work on farms in the summer.

Scrivener charged that education had a time-lag of 20 years in providing skills for the job market. Although the skills required by industry had changed greatly in the past 10 years planners of education curricula didn't think they had changed at all.

Scrivener's solutions however, were not very well received. He suggested a 12 month education system with learning smoothed out over each month.

This was followed by a cry for a return to the basics or as he said, "For goodness sake, let us teach them to read and write." There was an even more negative response to his ideas on a computerized matching of student job skills and job openings but generally his listeners seemed to feel his criticisms were more than justified.

Eats top Crombie

By ANNE HEALY

Toronto Mayor David Crombie's ad-hoc speech took second place to the dinner table at Wednesday's supper session of the Ontario government's conference on youth.

None of the 40 middle-aged "senior-level civil servants" from provincial governments across Canada seemed to notice that Crombie indirectly questioned the entire purpose of the conference. One delegate was more concerned about the water splashing gravy on the tablecloth.

Crombie's speech was to be: "The Influence of Government in Youth-related Issues—A Municipal View." But no one seemed upset when he dismissed the problem of youth with: "The problem most people have with youth is calling them youth."

"It's not true that someone speaks

'for a community.'" Crombie said. "The community itself has to identify its own need." He then went on to talk about decentralization of government instead.

Margaret Birch, minister without portfolio who heads the four-person Youth Secretariat sponsoring the four-day affair, said earlier: "This is a conference about youth," and admitted only four young people had been invited.

Birch said that although youth are welcome, youth were not being invited. The Variety was the only U of T student organization notified of the conference.

At the end of Crombie's speech the "representatives" politely clapped and then resumed the conversation where they had left off — discussing the possibility of getting tickets to the Maple Leafs' hockey game rather than attending the evening session.

Meanwhile at the dinner-tables a balding, bulging delegate was telling about driving his son's Peugeot up to Toronto for him — the son has decided to stay in Toronto, having found a "good" job in the bank, his dad said proudly.

City stalls on police station

By TRISH BLACKSTAFFE

The question of whether to tear down a row of houses and rebuild 52 Division police station on Beverly Street near Dundas or to renovate it on its present sight is proving problematic for Toronto City Council.

The Toronto constabulary owns the Beverly-Dundas Street area, north-east corner, where they are prepared to tear down a row of houses to build a new police station. The land was valued at $20 per square foot, the value of the houses not being taken into consideration.

The Toronto Parking Authority, under the City's auspices, owns a section of land in the Dundas-Simcoe-St. Patrick area, valued at $40 per square foot. But it comes under a by-law restricting the height of buildings built on that area.

Metro is urging a straight exchange of these two pieces of land because it recognizes that City Council wishes to retain the Beverly-Dundas area as residential.

The Metro Executive requires a city decision by Tuesday, November 20, and so far the city executive committee has stalled on making that decision.

In the event that the city decision is not made Metro is at liberty to tear down Beverly-Dundas houses and start to build a new 52 Division on Beverly Street despite the heavy opposition from residents groups and city council, and inadequate parking facilities.

If the executive committee does make a decision by Tuesday an emergency city council meeting will then have to be called by Tuesday to ratify the decision taken.

Strike support formed

By GLORIA THOMPSON

A U of T support committee for Artistic Woodwork Workers was formed following a noon rally in Sid Smith lobby yesterday.

Speaking to the rally attended by about 75 people, John Lang, a member of the union strike committee, said about 100 police a day appear at the plant to perform a strikebreaking role.

Lang called on "all students and concerned citizens to defend the workers against strike-breaking." Chris Todd, another member of the strike committee, said students could help by "raising money, joining the picket line and seeking further support for the strike."

SAC president Bob Anderson said, "This strike affects every worker, not just those at Artistic Woodwork."

The U of T support committee has chartered a bus to take students to the Artistic plant to join in a mass picket. The bus leaves at 6 am Monday from Sid Smith.

My eyes have seen: the professor who complains that he could do a better job on keeping files, or the professor who can also type who sneers because he can do

But it's my job, it's what I'm given to do, to fill one-third of my day, five days a week.

Or the secretary that works overtime, unrewarded for it, because it's expected of her, she's supposed to be dedicated.

Or meeting Professor Schumckatella at a movie downtown, who's all smiles and hallos and leering looks in the office in the daytime, but who doesn't see or acknowledge my existence out of the office context.

Or the first name business, where right from the first day on the job, I'm addressed by my first name, not out of friendship or familiarity or even by may consent, but because of my position in the hierarchy. You can work for someone for 50 years but he will still be Mr. Smith or Dr. Jones.

There is no room for satisfaction or pride in our work, or any feeling of achievement whatsoever, no fruits to our labor. I tidiously type and type, only to have what I've done returned to me for retyping when I'm finished because the professor made a mistake or changes his

COFFEE
MR. JONES

The social definition of a woman has been someone who is attractive, friendly, subservient to a man and brews coffee.

The social definition of a secretary is someone who is attractive, friendly, subservient to her boss, and gets coffee.

Women (some at least) didn't like the first definition. They wanted to be independent wage-earners; they wanted to work. So whoever it is that decides that type of thing said "Fine, women can work as secretaries". . . .

GIRLS! Are you looking for a fulfilling job, a job with a future, guaranteed to eliminate your self respect, distort your value, reduce you to a mindless, servile, lowly blob or a simpering sweet dolly!

Then become a secretary!

And if you want a job that eliminates any fear that you might actually be a human being, then become a secretary in a university department! Perhaps you thought that lowly freshmen held the bottom rung of the university status ladder — wrong, even lower than the freshmen are the clerical staff: the paper typers, the messengers, the coffee makers, the keepers of the world.

Let's drink to the hardworking people, to the salt of the earth . . . how frustrated I get when so many students and professors — some of them freaks and supposedly so hip to the troubled state of the world — run around the department I work in and look through me, oblivious to the fact that I am more than just an extension of my typewriter, or a producer of letters and other academic bullshit, who recognize my existence only and tokenly when they have some minor clerical problem that falls within my limited range of ability. Charity begins at home.

Secretaries are supposed to be pleasant, smiling, attractive, amenable, passive. You are not supposed to be bad-tempered, or ugly, or small.

You are either treated like a retard or a child and have every word spelled out to you with microscopically detailed instructions, or you are expected to be a mind reader and to know what you're supposed to do by telepathy.

There is only a stock approach to secretaries, a standard method of relating to the girl behind the typewriter — nobody acknowledges the fact that you're different or an individual, nobody relates to you as you are, you are only approached by the standard secretary approach method.

We mustn't let our bosses down, we must play out the role. You start off compromising and playing the obliging, simpering secretary role because you want to keep your job and your pay cheque, and before too long you really believe in keeping them happy and earning that rewarding pat on the head from time to time.

At home their wives wait on them — and in the office, their secretaries do. And how many secretaries really believe in it and lovingly regard their bosses as some sort of surrogate husband/father/lover figure?

We love our masters, we crave their approval, we sell ourselves out to oblige, because we have so well assimilated the values that keep us in our lowly position with our negative expectations. Happy, happy niggers.

Willingly we rush out to get him his coffee and cigarettes, obligingly, we sit in e secretary ideal that paper, in terms of time and labor and care, in producing a perfectly neat copy, reading illegible handwriting, correcting spelling and grammar mistakes, etc.?

And what of all the sad little delusions the typist might have about her own importance, about putting her best into her work, about having pride in doing a job well?

The small lower-case initials she types after her boss's uppercase initials at the end of a letter stand as a silent, tiny plea for recognition of her individuality as the typist. Who cares anyway?

Dare anybody seek satisfaction in the things they do for a wage, or are we all supposed to accept our alienation and estrangement from our labor as part of the whole picture, as a necessary drawback to being a wage-earner in society?

Some of us actually don't want a man to support us, we want to be self-sufficient.

And then there are the working conditions. A woman can work for years and years in her job — but she will gain only years, no promotion, no official recognition, no increased remuneration other than her annual raise.

What can be done, short of eliminating the secretarial role altogether?

A secretary with the ability should be given greater responsibility and independence and respect — and remuneration — as is the case with other capable intelligent workers in business.

Secretaries need not be supervised like children or have their wrists slapped because they are a few minutes late or because they did not follow office procedures to the letter. Moreover, it would surely help if they were treated as separate individual human beings, with different natures, abilities, personalities, etc.

Of course secretaries themselves need to develop a better attitude towards their profession, and towards themselves — they should not feel so subservient, they need to be less compromising and pliable, less satisfied with what they have at present, they should be more assertive, more sure of themselves, more demanding and have more respect.

They should organize together, not just for better conditions and wages, but also to help develop a stronger, more affirmative attitude towards themselves as workers and women.

This article first appeared in the Ubessey, the student newspaper of the University of British Columbia. It has been reprinted in Women's Work, published by the Working Women's Association.

But someone has to get coffee (and it might as well be you baby)

Of course (you say) women don't have to be secretaries. They have lots of other opportunities—jobs where they have a chance to exercise responsibilities and advance, and where they aren't expected to get everyone coffee. For instance a woman can become an editorial assistant for the Financial Post...

Before I'd even been hired I was told that Maclean-Hunter "looks after its own." "No one gets fired," said the loyal employees I spoke to. "Leaves of absence are everyday occurrences and rules and regulations are flexible."

Since I've never liked hassles on the job, compulsory hours, timed coffee breaks, being fired, etc.) I thought it might suit me. I decided to become one of Maclean-Hunter's "own": I joined the Financial Post branch of the family.

Unfortunately I neglected to find out just who Maclean-Hunter considers members of the family and who are the hired help.

The family consists solely of the editorial staff and publishers of the 70-odd business and consumer publications. Anyone else (the majority of employees) is hired help. And Maclean-Hunter isn't so concerned about pampering its servants.

Even though I was hired on the strength of my editorial experience, I was classified and paid as a secretarial worker. (Ironically I was told I had the job before they asked me if I could type up a decent business letter.)

I accepted the job because I needed the money (what there was of it). My responsibilities, I was informed, would consist of some writing, a lot of editorial research, proofreading, a little correspondence for the editor and the publisher of the magazine and a few odd jobs like xeroxing layout sheets and page proofs.

They told me in no time at all I could forget the secretarial work and move into a strictly editorial position. I told them that was the only reason I was accepting the job.

In the meantime, for almost a year I typed a lot of letters, did practically no writing or research, and spent most of my time at the xerox machine or running mindless errands like buying roses for my boss's clients. I was even expected to get coffee, which I refused to do unless I was getting some for myself.

In the end, I was fired for rank insubordination. They called it a "mutual parting of ways."

I only mention all this because my case is fairly typical of women and other second class citizens in any large Establishment establishment like Maclean-Hunter.

I should have known better. It was naive of me to be sucked in by the attitude of paternal benevolence. (We all know how Eaton's employees tenderly kiss the foot of old Timothy's statue for good luck as they are systematically deprived of their pensions.)

Maclean-Hunter has its share of discriminatory, not to say medieval, practices.

The first thing that caused a slight ripple of my left eyebrow was the application from (which I filled out after I was hired). Underneath the three little boxes for Mr/Mrs/Miss, I saw "If Miss, have you any plans for marriage in the near future?"

I wanted to answer "None of your God Damn Business" but since it was my first day on the job I hadn't yet become jaded and was able to make allowances. So I just put "no" in block capitals with three exclamation marks.

I think the next thing that triggered the area of my brain that goes "aarrgh" involuntarily was the matter of starting time. Maclean-Hunter's official hours are 8:30 to 5. This was instituted by old Father Maclean at the beginning of the war to help conserve light. (I mean the war that started in 1939, 34 years ago.)

But I was told not to worry — no one pays any attention to the 8:30 starting time. Most people came in at 9 or 9:30. That is, I found out later, if they are of the privileged class. Everyone else has to observe the 8:30 rule. Some people even have to punch time clocks. That means most women, and men who work as messengers, maintenance men or mailmen. Since the people who make the decisions can sleep in and miss rush hour anyway, the rule has never been changed.

Since I hate getting up in the morning and have never liked silly rules, I arrived at the office more or less when I wanted. That usually meant 10 or 10:30. There wasn't much they could do about it except to tell me occasionally that they wanted me in earlier in case I was needed. Nothing ever happened early in the morning (all the important people were still in bed). What they really wanted was for me to be there bright and early like all the other good little secretaries.

Questioning these archaic practices brings a slightly incredulous look and a faint laugh from most M-H employees. These gestures are often followed by a defiant "You should have been here in the old regime before Maclean died. Things were really rigid then!" In other words, don't rock the boat. And mentioning the word "union" gets an outright laugh. The ideal

One thing that helps maintain the status-quo where women are concerned is that there is room at M-H for advancement. Women with ambition bide their time in secretarial jobs until an editorial position comes. Once they've cleared that hurdle they're "one of the boys" and they generally don't look back.

But just because women can make it into the privileged class doesn't mean it's easy. I applied for an assistant editor's job within the company. I didn't get it, but I was told by several people that I shouldn't worry: the only reason I didn't get the job was sex bias. Of course. How silly of me.

If I had been promoted I still would have been discriminated against economically. Not that Maclean-Hunter has different pay scales for men and women. But men have generally been paid more at their previous job than women, so can demand and get higher wages. I was making $5,750 so my salary might have been raised to $6,500 or $7,000. The man who got the job was paid over $9,000. Typical.

After that, I made it perfectly obvious (I should say more perfectly obvious) that I was unhappy with my job, and why.

So when my boss called me in for my farewell speech ("I think we both agree that...") he grilled me on this women's lib stuff.

"I don't consider myself a Male Chauvinist," he said (not long after asking me if I had any legs under my jeans). "So what is it you're complaining about?" (Shades of Freud: My God, what do women want?)

I told him. "Hmmp," he replied. "Let's put it this way: if one person is making $6 an hour and another is only making $2 an hour, doesn't it make more sense economically for the person making $2 to get the coffee?"

That's logic, a la Maclean-Hunter.

The ideal secretary

So — some women don't like being secretaries; some women don't like being treated as secretaries.

A definite social problem. If this attitude were to spread, they might demand (a) more control over their work; (b) more money. Minus its steno pools, typists and file clerks, the business of the nation would grind to a halt.

Luckily for the business of the nation, there are people who specialize in smoothing over social problems.

Rhoda Finneron is one such smoother.

A couple of weeks ago, Finneron, (who teaches a course at Centennial College on how to be a legal secretary) lectured to aspiring young lawyers attending the Law Society of Upper Canada's bar admission course. As well as giving the students hints on how to handle their secretaries without actually changing anything (as in how to get them to work overtime without pay), Finneron's lecture gives some idea of what she teaches the women in her course.

Excerpt from the text of her lecture are printed below...

experienced secretary, can work in a vacuum, and I suggest that when one is dealing with a beginning secretary, regardless of what training she may have had, one should try to remember that she is in a completely strange environment when she begins her first steady job. She needs proper, detailed and patient direction to begin with. When giving her a job to do, tell her exactly what you want, and, if necessary, why you want it that way and not the way she has been taught to do it. Try to remember that she cannot read your mind. She has to be told what you want.

There will be times, happily, when your secretary will do what you asked for, and when this happens, and to reinforce the learning element involved here, so that whatever intelligence was applied to this particular piece of work will also be applied to every similar piece of work that follows along afterwards, tell her you liked the work. Reinforce the learning process. A pat on the back does far more than a kick.

With experience the right girl will grow. The perfect secretary is really an extension of her boss and believe me I say that with no derogatory intent whatsoever. I admire my own sex enormously. I think they are full of tenacity and grit, and when I say that the perfect secretary, male or female, is an extension of the boss for whom he or she works, I mean that as a compliment. No-one can grow in a job without knowing the job inside out and no-one can know a job inside out immediately. There is one way though, of becoming extremely familiar with the routine going on in an office and one way above all others of knowing exactly what a job is really all about, that is by knowing the file content as one knows one's own name.

ENCOURAGE YOUR GIRL TO BECOME FAMILIAR with your files and take a pride in her filing and finding skills. I know of no girl who really would choose a job as a filing clerk above all others, because most people find the job fairly mundane. But if a girl understands that knowing the boss's file content is one sure way of knowing a job inside out then she will take an interest in it and the filing will be done promptly and properly.

Whatever you ask her to do for you, try to let her feel that her and the time to go and eat it, (the dinner I mean), and taxi fare home from the end of the subway or bus stop. It may not be your firm's policy to pay for late work, but if it is not, permission to leave early or to come in late at a time when it is useful to her and convenient to you would be very much appreciated. In any case, perhaps what I am trying to say is do not take her for granted. If your secretary is a competent girl transcribe that before the end of the afternoon and, if necessary, may lay aside the other work that was given her until later on. Letters go to the post around four o'clock; she has got an hour or so in which she finishes off whatever else she left to go in and take more transcription, and by five, five-thirty, she is all finished to go home. It requires organisation, obviously, on the part of both the boss and the secretary, but I think contribution really matters to the firm and especially to you as her boss. When people feel that what they contribute really matters and that it is appreciated the work gets done in no time and people under these circumstances need hardly any managing at all because they take pride in what they do and they do it with pleasure and satisfaction and to the best of their ability and with a sense of true fulfillment.

Although these people seem busily at work in the efficient but cordial atmosphere of a modern office, they are actually mummified, and have not moved a muscle for 300 years!

If she works late for goodness sakes thank her. If it is very late try to give her some dinner money and really does make an all out effort on your behalf when it is required just try and do the same for her. You know, she might work late several nights, and she really does not mind because she likes her job, and she likes you, and she is achieving enormous satisfaction from the work that she is doing and that is fine, you know. But supposing she has a very good reason for wanting to get her hair done at lunchtime and it will take a quarter of an hour longer than the time she has for lunch then it is very good management to try and find this to be convenient on the rare occasions that a conscientious secretary will ask her boss such a favour. That quarter of an hour will mean a great deal to her self-esteem and that time will be repaid to you many times over in a genuine effort on her part to show her appreciation for your consideration and courtesy. You can never lose by it. It is a wild generalisation to say so, but I suggest anything you can get through in the morning, she should be able to get through that day. In the afternoon. After all, she is not with you all the time, you are not giving her dictation all through the morning. She is working all afternoon on transcribing or preparing whatever you have asked her to do. In my opinion, as a team, whatever you decide to do that day, she should be able to complete that day. Most girls expect to be called into the boss's office in the morning first thing, with or without the client's file, (according to the preference of her boss), and take dictation for an hour, maybe an hour-and-a-half and possibly to get some other work to do in the way of copy-typing or whatever it may be that is happening that day. Around ten-thirty, eleven o'clock she settles down and starts typing and usually the correspondence is finished by lunch time and in the afternoon, she settles down to all the other work she has been given for that day. Maybe she will be called back after lunch to do another half-hour of shorthand, and when she comes out she can that this is the sort of working arrangement that should be aimed at. It does not allow for interminable coffee-breaks, interminable chats with people in the next office, or wandering about the building seeing what the other people are all doing. It does allow for answering the telephone, receiving clients, and so on and so forth.

BEARING IN MIND that she will have dressed her best to come for the interview, do you like what you see? If you are not sure, ask her for her business telephone number before she leaves you at that interview, then call her the next day and ask to drop in and see you during her lunch hour and find out how she looks on a day that she has not taken particular trouble with her appearance. She may have run-down heels and dirty cuffs on her blouse, and appear slovenly. She may not be at all the type you want. If she is changing jobs and you have genuine reservations about employing her, but you cannot quite put your finger on them, make a telephone call to her former employer and find out why he is letting her go. She may be a trouble-maker and unable to work well with her colleagues. The former employer will be much more likely to be frank on the telephone about this sort of thing and he will never put it in a letter. This is not dirty pool, it is common sense. I firmly believe that careful hiring is the secret of success in the management of all people, not just women. I am sure you all organise your days so well that your secretary's day will be a joy. In closing, hire the best and most experienced secretary you can afford, making quite sure while doing so that you are going to run the office and not vice versa. The more experienced a girl is in legal work, the more use she will be to you from the start, but, of course, the more she will cost. The choice between a good beginner and experience is yours; there are points in favour of either approach. Some people like to mould their own Galatias, others find it a bore.

THE SUBJECT ON WHICH I have been asked to speak this morning is "What every young lawyer should know about his legal secretary, and is afraid to ask".

Let us start at the beginning, with actually hiring a girl.

When hiring beginners, do not hire on appearance only. I am sure that, like myself, you have had the most appalling chocolates out of the most glamorous-looking boxes. Some of your beginners will come to you holding pieces of paper saying that they can type at 80 words per minute and take shorthand at 150 words per minute or better, which sounds absolutely fantastic. Please do not take either their word or the piece of paper which backs it up as gospel. Getting down those hieroglyphics they call shorthand is not the trick; reading them back correctly is, and speed, I assure you, ladies and gentlemen, comes with experience and confidence. What about experience and what about confidence? How will that young girl you are giving a chance to work for you manage to grow?

WELL, AS IN MARRIAGE, start as you intend to carry on. If you want the girl who has come to work for you to turn out to be the best secretary that you could possibly hope for, then that is exactly what you must demand, and exactly what you must expect. Once you, as a boss, settle for anything less, you can expect to get nothing but second best from then on. I think most girls, whether they are beginners or experienced secretaries, really do try to please; they are anxious to make a good impression; they do want to get on. No-one, even an Pygmalion despaired of ever finding a girl who was attractive, cordial, efficient, could type without errors and make good coffee; and such was the creation of Galathea.

Walker's new electric sound is tough and tight

A few years ago when a folksinger turned up with an electric guitar we called it "selling out" as if virtue went out with steam. It wasn't selling out — no-one in particular was suddenly buying — although staying acoustic could fairly be called "holding out". Ian Tyson, a purist in long ago days, justified going electric by the terrible sound in most bars and halls where he had to play. When Tom Rush went electric he merely rushed from his idiosyncratic revivals of old black blues tunes to revivals of old black rock-'n-roll. For such reasons hold-outs became fewer and fewer. Jerry Jeff Walker was one of the last.

But this week Walker ambled up to the stage at MacKenzie's Corner House with a Fender telecaster under his arm and a five-piece band behind him. Really, what else could you do in a giant room with red decor, big dimmer bulbs and waitresses in backless gowns, where half the audience can't see the stage and where a drunken fan shouts out in the middle of a ballad "Hey, Jerry, play L.A. Freeway." ("Fuck You", Walker replied and continued playing "Old Time Feeling" through the din.) In bars one gets the lowest common denominator of music. It takes a hundred watts to even get that.

Even at the lowest common denominator there is a lot of music left and Walker's band did well. Since he has been known for loose, quiet tunes with speculative words ("Mr. Bojangles" for instance), the barhouse power and efficiency of Walker's band was a shock. He played like Tony Joe White, tough, funky and loud. The music cooked — can you hope for anything else in a bar? — particularly some tight vocal harmony between Walker and his bass-player, whose name nobody seemed to know. Walker's voice was well-miked and compelling as ever, all edgy and resonant. The new songs were substantially, um, simpler. Closing night is tomorrow, cover charge three dollars. It was a good, filling show, even if it wasn't what we ordered.

On the way into MacKenzie's a friend remarked that Dave Wiffen sounded more like Jerry Jeff Walker than Jerry Jeff did. Not that Wiffen is a copy, he's a gifted song-writer and singer and has been for years. Wiffen and Walker just have the same kind of taste and the same kind of voice, all deep, gritty and macho.

Dave Wiffen has been promising for so long that one has almost given up wishing him well. He's the most successful songwriter in the country as far as having his songs picked up (by Walker, Tom Rush, Eric Anderson, Ian and Sylvia, Ann Murray and, er, Harry Belafonte and Roger McGuinn). He's had more golden opportunities than most folk-singers have had jobs, but, one way or another, they all got blown, usually with liquor having something to do with it. (The same might be said of Jerry Jeff. The last time we saw him at the Riverboat he was so drunk by the second show that he managed a liquid three numbers and then made up another hour's music on the spot before weaving offstage. It was amusing for awhile, but then, as with all drunks, it started to pall. Making up songs while you sing them is a remarkable skill, but like baton-twirling it is not one of the more important ones. Walker, like Wiffen, was one of the dearest song-writers and watching that set was like watching a beefy ex-hockey idol puff through an old-timers game.)

Now, Dave Wiffen is back at the Riverboat through next week, with a new album, Coast to Coast Fever and the promise of big promotion by his record company. His music is better than ever with Bruce Cockburn making a large contribution to the album. The songs aren't his best: they are a little therapeutic, a bit personal and therefore not quite so sharply honed as "More Often than Not" or "Driving wheel." But they are still good songs that invite second and third listenings. One of the advantages of excelling at something is that even your second-best work is better than most people's best.

Though we haven't had a chance to catch him at the Riverboat yet, we're told that Wiffen is singing and writing happy tunes and that he hasn't been drinking for eight months. Word has it, he has finally pulled up his socks. With Jerry Jeff into his new bag, Wiffen may finally find the audience he deserved a long time back.

Second City has talent but could be even better

Second City's new show Terminal II starts off nice and easy with an interview spoof about a linguistic Miss who has taught her pet cat, the neighbourhood dog, assorted fruits and vegetables and finally a shovel to speak. This reliance on media take-off is a prop throughout the show but the second sequence, styled as a T.V. show called Pass the Buck, slices through the laughs with a razor sharp satire. It portrays an average housewife, representative of the public, up against the power structure of consumer society — management, labour and government. The inflation-unemployment buck gets swiftly passed and the loser housewife ends up with two major operations courtesy of OHIP as the consolation prize. The defensive retorts are quick, clever and threateningly accurate so that the quick shift into a Love Story tribute, taking us from societal insanity into marital absurdity, is an effective change of pace.

From the final hacking cough of this romantic travesty the show slides into an unusual and innovative High School guys groupie session, interrupted by a tomboy kid sister. This sketch like the best of the show suffers not from what it is but from what it could be. The sin is one of omission; not the creative lack of any one part but what the whole could be if developed further. For instance, the tomboy kid sister personality is given wide play as offset against the long-suffering gang. When she is set-up with one of the guys for a party that night an immediate follow-up is suggested and then denied. Much the same thing happens in the Film Society sequence which has fun with the Canadian film industry but again leaves us with less than its promise.

One weighty sentence comments on favourite Canadian themes — the famous Canadian director informs us that his next film is about two high school drop-outs from Port Credit, contemplating a homosexual relationship on a farm in Quebec who meet a 14-year-old unwed mother and stagnate on the east coast for a period between five to eight years. The follow-up is the showing of an original newsreel clip of the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand of Serbia. In a superb stylistic pantomime the group act out the original clip, reverse motion and re-play it as done by Sam Peckinpah and then Ingmar Bergman. Great stuff — but how about as done by a Canadian film director or are we to assume that they have no individual style?

The second set draws heavily on re-works of stock situations: a restaurant pick-up, the apartment with paper-thin walls and a studio shoot dig at William Shatner (Star-Trek) commercials and Loblaws. After some loosely structured jabs at Canada's sacred symbols — hockey heroes with donut chain shops, Ann Murray, Molson's and you know the rest — the group finally comes to its own with a rollicking all-Canadian musical extravaganza about leaving little Goose-Grease town for Toronto Wonderland. With visions of Harvey's, Fran's and the Elwood Glover show shining in the eyes of "the girl that got away", the number swells to a grand patriotic finale, imaging the sublime depths of our downbeat culture.

The cast, Glida Radner, Valri Bromfield, Eugene Levy, Dan Aykroyd, Jayne Eastwood and Gerry Salberg, have lightened up on expressive technique and imitative definition since the last show. With laughs longer and louder than before it is obvious that the talent is there. Expanding the existing material with more explorative write-ins, taking us to an end and not just a middle, could make this a really first-rate Second City.

Snuff and conversation with W.O. Mitchell

The Varsity—Mike Cowger

U of T writer-in-residence W.O. Mitchell plans to write a novel and assist young writers. He points out the paucity of great literature produced in North Dakota.

"You should have sneezed by now. People who aren't used to snuff usually sneeze," said the grey-haired man over lunch in the Massey College dining hall.

W.O. Mitchell, writer-in-residence this year at the University of Toronto, had just treated me to my first pinch of snuff.

Scottish snuff, slightly minty, and — according to Mitchell — the surgeon-general's report said it helps clear the sinuses. Which was handy for Mitchell, who had a bad cold.

His Massey College office was filled with books left by its previous tenant, political economist Ed Scharian. The room smelled of cigar smoke, which drifted in from poet and English professor Douglas LePan's office.

Doug LePan and W.O. Mitchell are Canadian writers. In case you didn't know, the university, like the real world outside, don't excel at publicizing its celebrities.

For example, the Czechoslovakian writer who shared the writer-in-residence post with Robert Finch several years ago, wrote in his year end report that he was slighted because The Varsity hadn't interviewed him, Mitchell said.

Mitchell is in the process of moving here from Calgary. For the past two years, he has commuted between Calgary and the University of Alberta in Edmonton to teach. For three years before that, he was writer-in-residence at the University of Calgary.

But the 59-year-old writer has never lost touch with Toronto, visiting the city five or six times a year for various reasons. He is looking forward to seeing his old friends, including former U of T president Claude Bissell, during his year here.

Mitchell has worked in most branches of media, but is best known as a novelist. His latest novel The Vanishing Point, is being released this month. He worked on it over a period of 15 years, and other ideas which came to him while writing it form the background of a new novel he has just started.

He said he "never says no" to ideas that come outside the perimeters of the writing he is doing at any given time, but saves them for future use. He strongly believes that a writer must write continually or jeopardize his creativity.

That's the advice he gave the creative writing classes he assembled in the past. "Assembled" because the eight to 12 people in each group came from inside and outside the university and were writing because they wanted to, not for a university credit.

He said he'd like to have this type of group in Toronto, meeting for one three hour seminar a week to discuss each other's writing — writing that is not short stories or chapters from novels. Mitchell tells his students to write for two or three hours a day about "whatever floats to the top of their consciousness."

Some of his students have had works published or gone into writing careers in other media.

Assisting young writers is only part of his job. He also gives readings and lectures during the year. But mainly, as he sees it, the post will give him the opportunity to write his new novel.

North American universities established writer-in-residence offices after World War II when they realized that writers, like research scientists, were producing something of value and should be given time — via economic security — to produce more.

"Art cannot be imported," Mitchell says, whereas scientific discoveries do not bear a national imprint. Writer-in-residence positions, like Canada Council grants, protect Canadian writers. But he dislikes nationalism in Canadian letters.

"When someone asks you 'what do you think of Canadian literature?' they really mean 'compared to American' and there's only one answer."

"Take Montana, Idaho, North and South Dakota and Minnesota, which would have a total population comparable to Canada's and what have they produced in the past 15 years compared to Canada? They've produced bugger-all."

But while he thinks Canadian literature is "marvelous and exciting" he says that defining it "turns it into a competitive and patriotic thing" like war or the Olympic games.

"Art is the only human activity that is not competitive. There's not a winner and a loser. But non-artists insist on making a win-lose game out of art."

Mitchell enjoys sailing because of the challenge of balance between himself, the boat and the elements. But for most others, it is a highly competitive sport.

"Labelling Canadian literature is the same bloody corrupting thing. Like 'ha-ha, one of our team won!'"

Atwood looks back

People used to treat the idea of Canadians being able to write in the same way they justify opinions that women can't do certain things—as if women and Canadian writers have "genetic defect", said Margaret Atwood between sips of peppermint tea at the Cafe Jurgens.

Atwood was last year's writer-in-residence at U of T. Poet, novelist, critic, until recently an editor at House of Anansi publishers, she would like to get Trinity and University Colleges didn't take up.

She refused to teach a creative course, preferring instead to meet with individual writers to discuss their works.

"The writer-in-residence isn't a teacher and shouldn't be considered one," Atwood said. And creative writing courses can't teach people to write—they can only allow professors "to give professional shortcuts to people

Things were made easier for her by novelist Margaret Laurence, who told her about her own experiences as U of T writer-in-residence several years ago.

For example, Laurence spent much of her first term at U of T giving free lectures and readings to every group that wanted one, Atwood said, because no one told her that she was not responsible for outside groups.

"People get the idea that because you're there, you're some kind of public servant," Atwood said.

Atwood is finishing up some editing and two screenplays and is ready to begin a new novel and a volume of poetry. She is also writing five new chapters for the second edition of her critical work on Canadian literature, Survival.

The new chapters will be about war, humour, magic, exiles, and literature as it relates to workers' struggles.

Survival has been criticized from all sides, she said. Radicals found it too conservative, conservatives too radical, and academics felt she had invaded scholarly territory she had no right or competence to invade.

Atwood defended Survival's lack of material on Quebec writers on two grounds. Firstly, she said, many Quebecois writers wouldn't want to be considered Canadian writers and secondly, only a minute number of their works are available in English.

"Quebec literature is the quintessence of Canadian literature," Atwood said. But, she added, "It's an arrogant assumption to assume that we all read French."

Atwood said that in the 1940's when she was in public school, students still sang songs like "In Days of Yore from England's Shore" and she thought of Winston Churchill and the Union Jack as Canadian property.

Her name and her writings are often linked with Canadian nationalism, which has factionalized into political ecological and even publishing interests, may have nothing to do with literature.

She added that some writers, previously involved with international political causes, have rechanneled their interests towards nationalism.

"They've finally figured out that you don't win wars on a global scale," she said.

Margaret Atwood feels a writer-in-residence shouldn't be considered a teacher, but was willing to meet with individual writers.

some pigs for her farm. But she can't decide whether to be a pig breeder or fattener.

Atwood said she made it quite clear last year that she wouldn't have time to visit each university English class separately. She offered one public performance to each college, an offer which was already writing."

She was in her office officially two days a week, but put in extra time, not much of which was spent on her own writing.

"You can't be a writer-in-residence and write a novel at the same time," she said. "I have to have an uninterrupted run at it."

So Who's Goldberg? is a superb production

An old house at the end of Trinity Square squats, resigned to the encroaching construction fences. Just out of the neon glare of the Yonge Street evening circus, you sit in a small room upstairs in darkness. It's 10:30. There's a fumbling at the door, the sound of keys, an embarrassed laugh, the door opens momentarily and a little piece of the city's street life slips in. The door closes and the lights trip on in the next room. Suddenly you feel like you're hiding behind the drapes.

If you've been through it yourself, you watch with a sometimes bitter, always ironic, nostalgia. If you haven't, you're intrigued all to hell, watching Martin the piano-playing homosexual, and Larry, the hustler he's just hired for the night, play out the little scene, in the little room, somehow so appropriate just off Toronto's main drag.

The vignette begun, Larry accepts the proffered drink while Martin thinks about men while wacking off—but he's not sure if he's homosexual. Another drink; the game continues. Larry has a limp—he had polio when he was a kid. Martin practices Bach's "Goldberg Variations" for eleven hours every day—but he can't play now—he's tired. Larry pushes his luck. "How long can I stay? I want to watch you practice tomorrow", he explains. Like everything else about him, a lame excuse. Martin, angered, kicks him out. Larry throws the ten dollars in his face and leaves—with no limp. Martin watches and downs his scotch; he doesn't play the piano either.

Louis Del Grande wrote and directed So Who's Goldberg?. Saul Rubinek plays Martin. Andy Arway plays Larry. The title:—from Bach's Goldberg Variations. The play?—variations on a theme. The production?—superb. There's nothing left to say.

Department of Management Sciences
University of Waterloo

Management Sciences is a new, small department focused on preparing students for decision making positions by teaching the concepts and tools required for problem solving.

Our students in the graduate programmes come primarily—but not entirely—from engineering, mathematics, and the physical sciences. Most have a background in mathematics from their undergraduate work, but some acquire it after they enter our programme.

Management Sciences' students learn to use basic concepts from the behavioural sciences, economics, and mathematics, and to apply them to a wide variety of areas. Our graduates, therefore, have been hired for an equally wide variety of jobs—from operational analysts to economists to manpower planners—by public and private employers.

Our professors and students have recently been doing research or consulting in applications to pollution control, job satisfaction, multi-agency decision making, design of computer facilities, inventory management, educational planning, public health, and a long list of other items. Students work closely with faculty (and work hard) and can pursue interests in these or other applications, if they wish.

We offer full and part-time graduate programmes. Students may start in either May or September. Financial aid is available. If you are interested in the Department of Management Sciences, fill in the coupon and send it on. We will send you more information and an application.

Vocal buffs take note: Maureen Forrester will be giving one of her rare performances in Toronto this week, at the St. Lawrence Centre, with John Newmark at the piano, in a concert of Franck, J.C. Bach, Berlioz, Turina and Wegner's Wesendonck Songs. Tickets are $4 and $5.

Organ fiends can get a second taste of the Faculty of Music's new machine this Sunday afternoon at the Concert Hall of the Edward Johnson Building. For $1.50 (with your ATL) you can hear organists Hugh McLean and William Wright in a concert of Buxtehude, Muffat, Böhm and (or course) Bach. Assisting will be Greta Kraus' Collegium Musicum and members of the Faculty, as well as the U of T Concert Choir. As with the previous show, all the proceeds will go to the organ fund, which still hasn't paid off the cost of the beast.

If you saw this year's production of Die Gotterdammerung at O'Keefe, the lectures of Philip Wulfs may hold some interest for you. He'll be talking on the New Bayreuth on Wednesday night at 8 pm in the Concert Hall of the EJB. The most important names in stage innovation in this century have worked at Bayreuth, and Wulfs will try to show the impact of the festival on modern opera production and goals. Free too.

There's a chance to hear what the Faculty of Music's own ensembles are up to this Thursday afternoon at 2:10 in the concert hall, and like many other EJB activities it's free, and worth the time if you can spare it in these hectic days.

Sunday evening the second opera of the Ring, Die Walküre will be broadcast on CBC from the tapes made live at this year's Salzburg festival. Last week's airing of Rheingold was good, but the orchestra drowned out the singers many times, making it quite a chore to hear the words.

Charles Mingus, great bassist and contemporary of Bird and Dizzy will be heard on a profile the same night at 11:03 on That Midnight Jazz. Fans of Canadian music have a field day on Wednesday at 7:03 pm with a program entitled In Praise of John Weinazweig, which will cover his life and works.

theatre

In the midst of a relatively toned down theatrical period in Toronto (thanks in part to an officious morality squad) there are nevertheless several new dramatic works to be seen. Creation 2 is presenting Concentration Camp for Words, a new play by Louis Capson, Wed. through Sun. until Nov. 17. It's to be found at St. Paul's Church, 121 Avenue Rd. Canadian actor Michael Kane is doing a one-man show of dramatic readings called Man of the World at the Old Church Theatre, 736 Bathurst St. The readings include excerpts from Walt Whitman, W.H. Auden, Oscar Wilde and other greats. Student rush tickets are $2.00.

On campus the Trinity College Dramatic Society experiments with Ed Dorn's metaphysical Western The Gunslinger. It's on stage tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30 pm and we're told that it's an "aesthetic treat."

Coming up next week are three new shows. The Global Village previews their first show of the season Bigger Than Both Of Us on Nov. 10, 12 and 13, with opening night Wed. Nov. 14. The story centres around an ace reporter who has to deal with a man from outer space but it's all a story in the newspaper whirlwind world. Student tickets are $2.00.

Le Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur opens Le Pendu on Nov. 15. Styled as a modern fable, the play is set in a mining town where human misery and hopelessness are alleviated by pieces of a hanged man's rope. The rope apparently brings hope and happiness but someone has to be hanged first. Student tickets are $2.00.

And last but probably most important Canada's premiere of David Rabe's Sticks and Bones happens at Hart House Theatre on Thursday Nov. 15. It's not to be missed!

rock

The fine Chicago blues of premier guitarist Mike Bloomfield and keyboard man Mark Naftalin, will be featured in a Sunday evening concert at Convocation Hall. Bloomfield built his reputation as a "great" guitar technician while an original member of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band (as was Naftalin). His further contributions to the fields of rock and blues music include standout performances on Bob Dylan's "Highway 61 Revisited" album, with his own band "The Electric Flag" and on "Super Sessions" and John Hammond's "Triumvirate". Tickets for the concert are modestly priced at $3 and are available from SAC.

At Fiddler's Green Coffeehouse (489-3001) tonight is Frankie Armstrong, a British traditional singer. String Band is featured on Tuesday. The admission is $1.

If you're following String Band you can see them again on Thursday in the St. Mike's main lounge from 12 to 2 pm.

Myles and Lenny are at the SAC pub tonight and tomorrow. Look for the pub in Engineering land between the Galbraith and Wellburg Bldgs.

Perth County Conspiracy is giving a concert at Massey Hall on Sunday at 8 pm. It should be a good evening since the appearance of both Richard Keelan and Cedric Smith is promised. Tickets are $2 or $2.50, your choice.

The three man printmaking show at Hart House continues through Sunday. Bartram and Dunsmore are too slick for my taste but Hovadic's prints have a grit and substance seldom seen in prints today. Try to ignore his subject matter and concentrate on his total effect.

Some reflections on the Adolph Gottlieb show at the Marlborough: Gottlieb, one of the giants of the Abstract-expressionist movement, at his best came across with a limping ferocity; the works showing at the Marlborough were executed with impeccable taste and judgement but are too tame and facile for my tastes. They are "handsome" in the way that pages of Chinese calligraphy can be handsome. Gottlieb at seventy or so has found his "knack" (as did Picasso and Matisse etc.)

Two new shows on campus which I'll review on Monday. Sculptress Martha Taylor Matthews at the Victoria Academic Building and Robert Rutherford at the Trinity Buttery. He's described as a surrealist (didn't Surrealism die as a quasi-serious art movement thirty years ago?) but the word on him is "promising."

IBM?

Let's talk about it

IBM Canada Ltd. needs people to work in an environment that's always interesting, and often demanding, but never dull.

We need technically-oriented people and people-oriented people. We need thinkers and we need doers.

Our recruiters will be coming to campus soon, to talk with people who think that they could have a future with IBM. If you would like to set up a meeting, tell your college Placement Office, and at the same time give them a copy of your personal resumé. Then let's talk about it.

Wanted: live sasquatch

In case there's any cash-short students looking for a way to make a quick buck for beer money, there's $100,000 to be had for simply taking your friendly neighborhood Sasquatch down to a book publisher's house.

Those who've never heard of a Sasquatch have probably never heard of British Columbia, either, for the Sasquatch is almost as famous as the province.

More well-established than flying saucers in the lore of Canada, the Sasquatch is a creature more ancient than a tenured professor and alleged to be far more fearsome.

McClelland — Stewart are dead serious about the offer, but there's a catch: the nationalist firm will only give the reward to a Canadian citizen. No mention was made of the citizenship of the Sasquatch.

A McClelland spokesman denied charges from environmentalist and conservation groups that the capture of one of these rare creatures would deplete their already diminishing numbers.

"The reward offer specifies that the Sasquatch must be captured alive," he said, and while the company would retain sole motion picture rights to the event, "the creature would be released at the site of its capture one week after scientific verification."

SMC mangles Vic, UC doctors Meds

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
PHE and SMC will slug it out next Tuesday for the Mulock Cup, emblematic of the Interfac football championship, while in the Division II final, UC will face the powerful New College juggernaut.

SMC transcended the usual limits of physical intimidation and violence to blast Vic out of the semi-finals 15-12. Vic, once synonymous with Mulock Cup supremacy, played gamely and exploded brilliantly for long gains on occasion but ultimately couldn't contain the charged-up SMC team who led throughout the game.

Neither team scored any points in the first quarter as Vic pitted its passing game against SMC's running brawn.

After Muir intercepted, SMC marched 46 yards to score a converted TD to Desimini on a screen early in the second quarter.

With little more than a minute left in the half, Vic was presented the ball on their 30 after a punt exchange. A buttered Hotrum inebriated the emotions of the Vic supporters as he sloshed over several defenders for 50 yards in two plays.

Tempers heated up like bunsen burners as Vic burned its way down to the 11, but finally SMC hosed down the drive by flattening Johnson at the four with no time remaining.

A fumbled snap on a punting situation set up Vic to move downfield on passes and penalties. Vic, bottled up long enough, pulled out the Cork who beat four men for a TD but it was unconverted and Vic trailed 7-6.

Liscio, possessor of a foot only a mother could love, booted a single to stretch the lead to 8-6.

Many prudent Vic souls were dismayed as SMC's Asuszek explored the seamy side of a zone for a 47 yard pass-and-run TD which was deliberately converted by a mirthful Liscio.

The Vic spectators were so quiet you could hear a pun drop. However, the exceptional Hotrum (no flask-in-the-pan, he) quickly fermented everyone's spirits again as he as he fled 42 yards from several sober pursuers to tighten the score at 15-12.

However, SMC's game plan called for its defence to become like corrugated iron at this juncture and with only two minutes left, the Vic offence found itself walled up completely. As his overjoyed team flowed onto the field to congratulate each other, SMC coach "Orph" appraised their chances against the unbeaten, untied PHE team.

"They're coming along," he said. "We've had a lot of injuries but we're going to be ready for them. It'll be a great game."

In the Division II semi-final, UC methodically dissected Meds 38-12 in an operation worthy of a Christian Barnard.

UC led 16-0 before the ambulance with the Varsity arrived in the second quarter. "It was Young on a power 28 and Pandey on a belly 31," said UC QB Rose helpfully to us. Both converts were run over for two points each.

A few fans (you could count them on both hands if you've had a saw-mill accident) watched UC's MacGillvray and Med's first degree Burns trade TD's to notch the score at 24-6 before the half ended.

While an ice-age slowly descended in the arena and froze the last few fans to death, UC's Young hurled his ice-flecked body into the endzone for another TD. Not to be outdone, Pandey indid another UC TD, streaming his consciousness behind fluent blocking.

In the last few wintry seconds of Med's existence, Russell plunged over to make the score 38-12 after Dalziel ran 31 yards on a broken play (which will be grumpily reviewed by the Varsity Theatre section).

UC (2-2-1) now plays New (5-0). When approached for predictions, New coach McKay growled, "Am I going to get quoted correctly? All right then, it's going to be a good game, and Goldblatt, don't say anything unless I censor it."

Goldblatt (New defensive coach), taking full advantage of the sensationalistic tendencies of the Varsity, roared, "UC is a good team but their players aren't as good as ours unless I'm making a great mistake." (Pin that up on the wall, UC.)

Erin, Eng reach soccer final

By ROD McBEY

The sun finally came out but the wind continued to dominate the soccer play-offs as Engineers found little trouble disposing of St. Mikes 2-0 in the first division semi.

The wind and the hard surface made ball control very difficult, and the plumbers could only manage one goal in the first half with the wind at their backs when Mirkopoulos volleyed home a rebound off a corner kick.

In the second half SMC took the wind, but a weak offence failed to muster any serious threats to the Engineering keeper. Towards the end of the half the play switched almost totally to the St. Mikes' end with the Eng halves easily containing any threats to break out.

The Mikes' strong defence and goaltending kept them in, but Kozak counted the insurance goal on a screen shot that seemed to nick a defender before catching the corner.

The score might have been much higher, but Engineering seemed reluctant to shoot and usually lost good chances from holding on to the ball too long.

In the other first division semi-final Erindale ended the season for Vic at 4-1. It was a long road up for the Victorians, who finished deep in the cellar last year.

Erindale took the advantage of the wind and sun in the first half but play was fairly even until Herman So capitalized on a badly-cleared Vic ball.

Vic had a chance to equalize but missed on a penalty shot. After that it was just a So-So game.

Later in the half a 30-yard free kick rebounded from the crossbar and the ubiquitous So banged it in.

Early in the second half the Vic team couldn't seem to get its offensive game off the ground, despite the aid of a cold west wind. Erindale dominated the early play with fast short passing.

Despite Vic's attempts to neutralize So, he picked the top right corner of the net with a beautiful 30-yard shot for a hat trick.

Vic replied to Erindale with a cross off the right wing to governor Regan who headed it in at the pass to narrow the gap to 3-1. With good aggressive passing play Vic then forced the Erindalians onto the defensive. They missed a good chance when the Erindale 'keeper dropped the ball and they shot wide.

In its offensive efforts Vic opened up and got caught napping by Lewitsky who salted the game away with a blazing shot. From then to the whistle it was strong Erindale defence and Vic never had a chance.

The Engineers have come on very strongly since the beginning of the year to mount a serious title defence. On the basis of to-day's play, we still have to suggest that Erindale's smoother, more co-ordinated offence will prevail for the Arts Cup.

Admin using faulty data to destroy Food Sci: dean

Dean Ira Armstrong charged yesterday that the university administration is preceeding with plans to dismantle her Faculty of Food Sciences on the basis of faulty conclusions reached three years ago "when the department was at its lowest ebb."

Armstrong said in an interview that her faculty is being unfairly judged on the basis of enrolment in the department in 1970.

She said that enrolment has tripled to 270 students from 94 in the last three years and all indications are that interest is strong among students in Food Sciences.

The budget subcommittee of the now-defunct Senate said in a report in 1970 that academic standards of the faculty had declined to the point where "it is unable to place its graduates."

Because of this, the subcommittee recommended that steps be taken to phase out the faculty. This was not done, but the future of the faculty has remained uncertain ever since.

The latest proposal, which the Governing Council will consider November 22, is that the faculty's Food Science and Nutrition programs be combined with the School of Hygiene's Department of Nutrition from a new Department of Nutrition and Food Chemistry.

Armstrong said that enrolment in her faculty had declined to its "low ebb" in 1970 because of "faculty conditions which existed at that time." She refused to elaborate.

She indicated, however, that these problems have been solved in the last three years. Armstrong said she became acting dean in 1970 and dean in 1971, but said she can claim "no credit" for the dramatic reversal in enrolment.

The university's Office of Statistics and Records drastically underestimated projected enrolment in the faculty. For the current academic year, the office projected an enrolment of 218, which was low by 72 students.

For 1974-75, the office projects enrolment of only 175 students. Projections for subsequent years show sharp declines, and the office predicts that there will be no students at all in the faculty by 1978.

Ironically, while student enrolment has trebled in the faculty, teaching positions have declined by one-third. There now are the equivalent of 15 full-time faculty positions, down from 22 in 1970.

Armstrong said she has "no idea" what will happen to faculty members if the governing council approves plans to dissolve the faculty.

"The tenured ones, of course, will be kept on," she said.

But the fate of staff members who do not have tenure "hasn't been settled."

The dean also said she foresees possible legal difficulties in the dismantling of the faculty because of the terms of the endowment which established the faculty 66 years ago.

Lillian Massey Treble's endowment of $100,000 specified that if the department is at any time "abandoned," the original gift, plus all accumulated interest, shall be paid to Victoria University.

It then would be used to fund a professorship in the theological department of Victoria University "for the instruction and training of students in efficient methods of preaching and conducting the public services of the (United) Church."

Armstrong said there "could be some difficulties for this new department to take over our building" at the corner of Bloor St. and Queen's Park Crescent.

"I imagine that someone will have to have the lawyers take a look at it," she said.

psych students condemn 'impersonal' course

By BOB BETTSON

An organizational meeting last week of psychology students interested in making changes in the department heard a number of complaints about the impersonality of the first year introductory course, the dominance of behavioral psychology and the lack of an alternative program in humanistic psychology.

The Wednesday meeting was organized by Laurie Miller, a student psychology curriculum committee member with the help of the Arts and Science Student Union to gain support for Miller's upcoming bid to gain departmental approval for the offering of two new second year courses on humanistic and depth psychology.

In an interview last week Miller said that when he had proposed the new courses in October, Chairman A. N. Doob had ruled that it was not within the jurisdiction of the committee. The courses will have to be approved by a department meeting.

The curriculum committee has only two students out of eight members and it is only an advisory body to the chairman.

Miller said "the way psychology has been taught at U of T has alienated many people." He explained that the department is experimental, that is that it is concerned with manipulating certain phenomena in the environment to see how they affect people and animals.

"I know a number of people who have been alienated by first year psychology who were really interested but just haven't wanted to go on," he said.

Miller said that "many questions are just not dealt with." The department teaches the behaviorist theories of American psychologist B.F. Skinner "very extensively" according to Miller. In this way the department leaves out or downplays the work of new humanistic psychologists such as R. D. Laing and Carl Rogers.

When Miller's request for the new courses came up he was told that there was no one in the department capable of teaching courses in depth and humanistic psychology. Depth psychology deals with questions of the unconscious.

"I think that since one of the basic principles of the university is academic freedom, academic issues should be examined from a variety of viewpoints," he said.

Miller said that many students want courses in humanistic psychology and social and applied psychology, "but students are not in any real position to affect decisions within the department."

Though course unions in psychology have had little success in the past, Miller hopes that students can organize to gain changes within the department.

There were a number of complaints from first year students who attended the meeting. One said that the first year course, which is entirely based on tapes with students learning at their own pace, has led to a lack of human contact with either the professor or other students.

Another complained that social psychology was understressed and physiology over emphasized. There were also complaints that one professor in the department, B. B. Murdock, had a condescending attitude toward students, answering some questions by saying "you wouldn't understand."

There were also complaints that the course load for psychology students is too heavy and there are too many prerequisites for upper year courses.

Miller said that in the case of one new methodology course proposed for next year, which will be a prerequisite for the fourth year theses, he could not attend a meeting but submitted his comments in writing. They were never read to the committee and the chairman said he had not checked his box to see if they were there. The course was approved.

Though the department has given financial problems as another reason not to teach the new courses, Miller thinks that priorities should be shifted. "This is so important that money should be taken away from existing courses," he said.

"The fundamental thing is that there are certain things that students want to learn. Humanistic psychology is not a unique course. It is offered at many other places," he added.

There will be another psychology student meeting Wednesday to plan further action and discuss the setting up of some sort of organization to involve psychology students in taking action on their complaints.

Campbell says grades 'unfair to students'

For the Academic Affairs committee, grading students is like the weather: everybody likes to complain about it, but nobody does anything about it.

Such was the attitude at their meeting last Tuesday when there was considerable talk about the discrepancies in the grading of students, but nothing was done about it. In fact, it was officially labelled as "information only," which the rules say means "no vote."

A report by Scarborough Principal Riph Campbell indicated:

"Wide discrepancies, though, lead to injustices to students. For example, and without criticism of either English or History, 20 per cent of the students taking English courses at Scarborough received A's whereas 7.5 per cent of those taking History courses received A's."

Campbell said this fact means "we are being unfair to students," but the committee did nothing with the problem.

Many of the discrepancies discussed dealt with Scarborough, but committee chairman J.E. Dove said the suburban campus "is not being pilloried or set up as an example of what not to do."

In fact, the only criticism coming forward from Dove was directed at Trinity College. Dove had asked for a breakdown last August of how many students received which grades.

A written reply from W.S. Rogers, acting vice-provost and dean of Trinity, said that since the college's faculties are part of the Faculty of Arts and Science, the committee should get its figures from that faculty and none would be forthcoming from Trinity.

Dove termed the reply "evasive," saying, "we're not going to get very far in relation to this so long as there are separate college departments for college subjects."

Campbell indicated in his letter a possible range of discrepancies which would be acceptable and anything past those acceptable discrepancies ought to be "questioned."

The Campbell scale would indicate three areas which might be questioned:

- * A course with more than 25 students with a mean grade of less than 60 or more than 75;
- * a grading pattern with less than five per cent or more than 30 per cent A's;
- * A high incidence of F's.

Campbell submitted statistics from the 1972-73 academic year at Scarborough which showed that of 14,717 student-courses taught the average mark was 66.1.

This broke down into 16 per cent A's, 36.3 per cent B's, 26.5 per cent C's, 11.8 per cent D's and 9.1 per cent F's.

Campbell pointed to the first year commerce course as "obviously a serious problem." He said of 146 enrolled, three got A's and 6 failed with a mean of 49.8.

He used this example to urge a comparison about "teaching practices, student qualifications at Scarborough vis-a-vis the St. George campus."

The commerce course, he said, has identical outlines and examinations across the three university campuses and final exams are corrected by professors on a random basis so no professor corrects papers from his own stu^d

By vii. the marking system Campbell was implying the problem rested somewhere either in the teaching of courses on the various campuses or the students.

Not every faculty submitted reports to Dove's request last August, but the reports submitted showed there is no clear pattern to grading schemes in the university.

For instance in the Faculty of Medicine, tests are usually multiple-choice exams which are machine-scored with new standardized and normalized scores produced for the instructors.

However, the actual grades in the Medical School are only Honor-Pass-Fail, a System which was reaffirmed last week following an attempt by some faculty members to bring back the old grading System.

The Medical School only released a partial listing of grade breakdowns for the committee indicating how many got honors, but only saying, "Very few students have failed."

The percentage of student getting honors in Medicine School decreased from 24.7 per cent of first year students to only 12.1 per cent of the fourth year student during the 1972-73 academic year.

Bureaucracy seen as enemy

Government bureaucracy is managerial, administrative conservative and the enemy of party policy, Jack Weldon, a McGill economics professor, told an NDP lecture at OISE last Wednesday night.

The real battle doesn't take place at elections, the former member of the planning secretariat in Manitoba continued. When the NDP wins an election and inherits the bureaucracy of previous governments, the race is on between the search for a new apparatus and the capture of the new government by the old bureaucracy.

The real problem, he felt, was not whether the NDP had power but whether they were capable of exercising it. Unless they had a congenial bureaucracy there would be no significant effect of NDP control of parliament.

Weldon began his lecture reviewing CCF - NDP governments in power by contrasting "the incredible disproportion" in influence of governments and private enterprise. In governments there are thousands of people who are responsible for events. In private enterprise, only one, two or three, can make changes, he stated. The differential effectiveness of both bodies reflects this, he said.

The main body of Weldon's speech was directed to explaining the failure of NDP governments to effect policy as much as party members would like. The managerial nature of government bureaucracy was the heart of the problem the NDP faced, he felt.

NDP governments are by definition geared to policy as opposed to the old line parties who are "merely a collection of baronies" dedicated to managing what already exists. The NDP inherits their autonomous bureaucracies which are instinctively resistant to the innovative and interdependent nature of social-democratic policy.

Bureaucrats are only interested in bureaucracy and not in changing the world. The major budget and cabinet priorities are distorted by them to deal with the trivia with which they are most comfortable, he charged.

The critical point for an NDP government is therefore the establishment of a planning cabinet which can subordinate the civil service to it. Then they can deal with policy rather than management.

Such a policy might even require a revision of the traditional political independence of the civil service, he said. "If they have a political complexion, they can't have indefinite tenure," he argued. "Government has a right to a congenial bureaucracy".

Parity is poppycock: Dupre

By DOUG KELK

J.S. Dupre has dismissed student parity as "just so much poppycock." Dupre, Political Science department chairman, went on to say that he was basically in favour of the Forster Report, which calls for no student participation in hiring, firing, tenure and staffing decisions.

"Students are just not interested in the workings university's governing councils these days. The large minority that was politically interested a few years ago seems to have become as unconcerned as were most students ten or fifteen years ago," said Dupre during a weekend interview.

Last month, 30 per cent of the student population, over 6,000 students, turned out to vote 2-1 for student parity and 8-1 in favor of student representation on hiring firing and tenure committees.

"Unlike Mr. Dupre," said psychology department chairman G.E. Macdonald, "I don't agree that staff is the best judge of staff. Decisions concerning both faculty and staff should be made by both parties and, ideally, made in public: where anyone can criticise them. That way, the interests of others are not overlooked."

Macdonald's position corresponds to the position put forth by the faculty association last month when it called for a more open method of granting tenure.

Currently tenure is decided by behind closed doors, not even the candidate for tenure knows who sits on the committee and why they may have turned him or her down.

This closed-door system has led to an avalanche of appeal of negative tenure decisions being launched to university president John Evans.

The faculty association called for the candidate to be able to appear before a tenure committee as a "right", but the association agreed with the Forster report's majority recommendation of no student participation in the decisions.

A minority of the Forster task force urged the proceedings be public and that students be allowed to participate.

R.C. Plowright, a member of the Faculty Reform Caucus, insisted that there should be parity on committees whose decisions affect the affairs of both students and faculty.

"Unfortunately students in these positions are often reluctant to act and this gives ammunition to the critics of student parity."

Math chairman George Duff, whose office was occupied in protest against the department's denying two professors tenure and firing another, had no comment on the issue of parity last weekend.

However, while his departmental offices were occupied by students last March, he was quick to denounce parity saying: "Students rate highest those teachers whom they learn the least."

However, that quote from Duff first appeared in print six months before his department offices were occupied by students.

The quote originates from a September, 1972, article in Science magazine where a study was done alleging such a conclusion.

Plowright's statements are not quite the position of the Faculty Reform Caucus, which decided last week not to take a position on student parity but instead press the issue of representation in general on departmental tenure and staffing committees to the Faculty Association for a vote.

While Plowright himself is in favor of parity in certain circumstances, the caucus of which he is a member has hedged on taking a position at this time.

Youths to plan jobs

By MARGARET ROBERTSON

Margaret Birch, minister without portfolio responsible for the Ontario Youth Secretariat, announced Friday young people will be directly involved in planning the provincial government's summer employment programs.

Birch told the delegates to last week's conference on youth this decision had been made as a result of discussion at the conference.

Young people involved in last year's programs will be brought in to evaluate the programs and to help form them for next year.

"We're going to make a special effort to develop programs that meet the specific needs of specific areas," she said.

This will be done with the co-operation of youth in the regions concerned. The secretariat has become aware that many areas in northern Ontario have more in common with the far north than the southern cities, she said.

Commenting on the problem of finding representative youth, Birch said standing youth advisory committees take a "big step towards creating a bunch of little bureaucrats" and that instead, the Youth Secretariat would be seeking "ad hoc groups of young people who are directly affected by the specific things we will be doing."

"We still won't be able to be sure that every young person who helps us is really representative, but the odds will be a little better," she added.

Birch admitted that in the past, summer employment programs have been designed to meet government objectives.

In an unscheduled address to the conference following the Birch speech, Ontario Federation of Students Research Co-ordinator Paul Axelrod told the delegates governments should first determine the problems of youth before attempting to discuss them.

He said actual needs were not understood and he had encountered only stereotype visions of youth. Youth is too broad a base for discussion, he added. Young people from different areas and different segments of the community have different problems.

He criticized the conference, saying that while the discussions on OFY and LIP were "more concrete," the delegates saw youth grants as a "panacea for the problems."

He warned the civil servants not to be disappointed if their efforts on behalf of youth were not always successful because "you can't cure cancer with an aspirin."

A representative from the University of Waterloo, angry at the lack of youthful representation at the government workshop, said that the elected representatives of the National Union of Students should have been invited.

He presented a brief to the conference which was not read due to time limitations, but which was to be distributed to the delegates when duplicated.

John Nelles, youth consultant for the department of manpower and immigration, said while the federal government is not trying to get out from under, "more appropriate funding" is being sought for LIP grants at both the provincial and community levels of government and from the private sector as well.

Adding that LIP was becoming "job supporting" rather than "job creating," he said the money should come from those who will benefit from the grant.

Financing reviewed

LONDON, Ont. (CUP) — A new system for financing Ontario's 15 universities is being reviewed by the province.

Spokesmen for the ministry of colleges and universities say a major change in the present funding system is being considered because several universities whose enrolments have declined are suffering financial hardship. The province will outline its plans in a report next month.

The province now uses a formula tied to enrolment to determine the funding which each university receives.

Under the present formula, a first-year arts and science student is worth one Basic Income Unit (BIU) of $1,800. Funding for students in other disciplines and at other levels is calculated in terms multiples of BIU's. For example, a graduate student is worth the maximum, six BIU's.

Two organizations which advise the province on university matters both agree that the formula must be changed to keep pace with inflation. The Council of Ontario Universities (COU) and the Committee on Universities Affairs (CUA), which met in London on October 15 and 16, have proposed that the province link its funding formula to a national inflation index.

Small universities such as Brock in St. Catharines and Lakehead in Thunder Bay require a change in base grants if they are to survive, the two organizations said.

Abortion trial goes to jury

MONTREAL—The abortion trial of Dr. Henry Morgentaler goes to the jury today after the charge to the jury by Associate Chief Justice James Huggess.

That charge to the jury could be a crucial point in the case. Morgentaler, accused of performing an illegal abortion in his clinic here August 15, has based his defence on a section of the Criminal Code which provides immunity for certain kinds of medical operations.

The clause says that if the operation is "for the benefit of the person" if it is reasonable and "is performed with reasonable care and skill" then there is immunity for provisions under the Criminal Code, the law under which Dr. Morgentaler has been charged.

The Crown, however, told the jury in its summation Friday that this specific section of the law has never before been invoked except as a defence to criminal negligence.

Justice Huggess, in his directions to the Queen's bench jury of 11 men and one woman, is expected to instruct the panel on whether that defence is admissible in their deliberations.

In his five-hour summation to the jury Friday, Defense Counsel Claude-Armand Sheppard told the jurors the evidence clearly showed the 26-year-old woman who had received an abortion from Dr. Morgentaler was justified in getting the operation on medical, psychological, and socio-economic grounds.

These grounds, Sheppard said, established the operation was performed for the benefit of the woman's health.

Sheppard told the panel he had been scandalized by Crown evidence indicating it should be up to the physician alone to decide if a woman should have an abortion.

However, in his summary to the jury, Crown Attorney Louis Robichaud said the arguments of the defence are tantamount to accepting "abortion-on-demand."

Robichaud urged the jury not to accept the defence principles that dislike of a law gives the right to violate it with impunity.

"He knew we had a strong case, and he decided he had to try to prove the operation was medically necessary," Robichaud said.

Robichaud said the woman testified that she had not discussed her reasons for having the operation with the accused before having it done.

During testimony by defense witnesses the witnesses had been given a hypothetical situation similar to the woman's and had given their approval to an abortion decision based on the facts of the situation and state of mind.

However, Robichaud said even if the situation described to the witnesses was an actual person, the woman testified she did not tell the accused all the facts in the five-minute interview before the operation.

Court evidence indicated the woman was an immigrant student living on $200 a month, and Sheppard indicated that if Dr. Morgentaler had not given the woman an abortion, she would have gone elsewhere "at any cost."

Masses meet

SAC is sponsoring a mass meeting Wednesday noon at the Sid Smith Foyer to discuss the student position about the new discipline code. In a position paper released today (see page 5) SAC claims to code "could be used to implement a repressive system, stifling dissent on campus" using a system of "harassing potential dissenters with minor charges."

Flip-flop on pubs

TORONTO (CUP) — In a complete reversal of its former stand, the Liquor Licence Board of Ontario (LLBO), has agreed to deal with student groups over the issuing of permanent liquor licences for student pubs.

Until the change in policy the LLBO had categorically refused to confer with student representatives and had turned down an application from the University of Western Ontario to allow its students to operate their own pub.

The change in the LLBO's stance apparently resulted from pressure by members of the provincial cabinet, notably Jack McNeil, minister of colleges and universities and John Clements, minister of consumer and corporate affairs.

Pressure was also put on the ministers by Robert Nixon, Liberal Leader and Morton Shulman, (NDP—High Park) after they learned of the LLBO's decision to deal only with "senior administrators in the universities" about the licences.

Student business manager for Ryerson, Don Sanderson, said, after talking to government officials, a reasonable compromise has been reached. University administrators would still be given the licences to hold, according to present policy, but the understanding would be that student bodies for the respective schools would be completely responsible for running their pubs and profits from operations would be theirs.

"This is a move to keep everyone happy," explained Sanderson. "The students will be happy because they will have complete control of their operations and the teetotalers will be happy because the administrators, and not the students, will be responsible for the licences."

Sanderson and the other members of the Ontario Universities Pub Managers Association, said they were pleased that the provincial government was finally modernizing its thinking.

Noranda: 'Chileans had 1,000 crazy ideas;' Varsity: 'Canadians second-rate imperialists'

Friday The Varsity printed a letter from Noranda 'magnate' Adam H. Zimmerman responding to our article of November 2, linking him with both the U of T Private Support Board and the federal government's Export Development Corporation.

We replied to Zimmerman's letter with a lengthy rebuttal of some of his statements. Today we let Noranda's comptroller and a vice-president speak for himself.

What's a million?

Zimmerman's response to our questions went somewhat along the lines we might have expected. Oblivious to what we believe to be the realities of the term 'imperialism' and 'dependence', he quite openly revealed why some corporate executives are the way they are—in brief, he comes close to fitting the stereotype.

We asked Zimmerman about Empresa Fluorspar Mines Ltd., a company 49 per cent indirectly controlled by Noranda. His answer implied that because Noranda's interest wasn't in the majority there were therefore ample restrictions placed on the corporation, and that, indeed minority interest was not significant on a world scale. (After all, income from the mine was only about $3 million last year).

However, he did admit that Noranda owned totally a gold mine in Nicaragua—Empresa Minera de El Setentrion, which brought in slightly less than one million dollars for the company in 1972.

Zimmerman said that to compare these two mines to those of the rest of the world "would be like comparing the corner grocery store with a supermarket", and added that he didn't mind if we added "with one or two exceptions" to his statement that Noranda had no more than a minority interest in any venture outside Canada. "I just didn't think that was significant", he said.

Zimmerman added: "You're quite right; these are the two (outside companies) but they're the only mining operations we have outside the country. We have a number of participations in wire and cable companies in Columbia, Venezuela, and Mexico. There's one going in Brazil. But they're pretty... you know we always figured we're doing it right there by going in. We have the equipment usually and the other people provide the local management. It works out very well."

Zimmerman also contradicted the Financial Post corporate card we had quoted Friday, saying that Syngore Exploration, a Noranda subsidiary, had folded "as far as we are concerned." He explained that he didn't know whether they still operate under that name. "That was a fellow named Edwards" he added, "who had been employed by us and wanted to go in on his own so we backed him to a degree through us."

But Zimmerman did add that although Syngore was no longer exploring in the Republic of Ireland, Noranda keeps "what really amounts to a reconnaissance type of exploration. We're not moving in big drills and things of our own... but we keep men... well there's one man and a helper in the UK and Europe... their job is to know what's going on, but it isn't an operation in any sense of the word."

Zimmerman forgot about the United States

When we run through a list of some of Noranda's other holdings Zimmerman, somewhat startled, said, "You know, I suddenly realize I that I made a mistake in that letter. I guess I said no foreign country and the United States is a foreign country so I'm quite wrong, I completely overlooked the United States."

That's one reaction we might have expected. Capitalism, and, in fact, capitalism of the multi-national corporation nature does in fact, not know any borders. Corporate executives, as the senior statesmen "underdeveloped" countries would want companies like Noranda to go in—the governments or the people, and, in turn, which class of people?

Chileans had "a thousand crazy ideas"

Zimmerman also had some comments to make on the Chilean situation and the overthrow of the Allende government. He talked mainly about how business was affected after Allende came to power:

"What happened in Chile was that the government moved in and took over these things (factories) with a thousand crazy ideas and the people who were running them wouldn't stay there and they left. So they really decimated the management and technical superstructure; as well as that they went into the world markets and screwed up one thing after another and then they made all those wild-eyed promises to their workers with the result that they its weaker hemispheric neighbours. And what about the fact that most of the people running the factories left Chile after Allende was elected (according to Zimmerman); doesn't this contradict his position that the management are nationals from the "underdeveloped" country?

Zimmerman also indicated that the Export Development Corporation measures standards of assistance on purely economic grounds. "The EDC is fundamentally a commercial institution", he said, "it's job is not to put in money that's going to be lost or taken away."

Columbian operation a model to follow?

Zimmerman felt that Noranda's Columbian operation was a good example of how to develop an 'underdeveloped' country.

"I went down to Columbia a couple years ago", he said, "and it's really quite fantastic what that (plant) does. It provides industry for a lot of

of their firms have become, in effect, the finger extensions of the multi-national body. So it's not too surprising that there are businessmen in this country that recognize no borders since the dollar doesn't have one. The whole thinking process is geared toward international flows, not national development.

We also questioned Zimmerman about Noranda's interest in Australia. He pointed out that he believed any corporations investing or developing in Australia now had to have majority Australian control. He did, however, acknowledge the fact that Noranda was exploring and hoped to follow this up through development. As he put it: "That's the whole ball game... but you know you go in on the rules of the game... and particularly the underdeveloped countries would do handstands to get you there in the hopes that you would develop something."

And Zimmerman's probably right. But we wonder who in the were on strike about every other month...literally...and they totally disrupted what was an ordered and—I have no idea how your average Chilean lives and your average Chilean miner...whether he was better than he would be if he were picking corn or whatever else he does. But certainly these industrial enterprises provide a kind of stability and an income that is pretty desirable. But you know it was really a self-inflicted wound and we had no—we in Noranda had no special interest making a case pro or con."

Noranda's comptroller, therefore, sees the Chilean overthrow as being a purely internal matter, with no interference from any outside influence.

There appears to be an apparent contradiction in his argument, however, for, as one of the chief executive officers of a multi-national corporation (albeit a small multi-national) Zimmerman must realize how quickly borders become non-existent and how much influence a powerful country is likely to have on people in an area that wants industry and needs it. It provides education really...that's a fundamental thing it does. It brings people up to a level of ability they didn't otherwise have.

"Our Columbian operation...could tell us to go tomorrow but there's really no point in their doing that because, on the assumption that they're honorable and they're going to buy back—pay back—what we have invested there... and short of stealing, that's what they're going to do. So they have to put out money to do something that really doesn't do them any good because then they may, while they have the present technology, cut themselves off from future technology and development, and some of the advantages there are to being allied to a fairly large and substantial group. They can do it and they'd still have their jobs and their plant and everything else but the point I'm trying to make is that if you do it right they recognize it's good for them and good for us...We don't take great goods of money out of these places usually...."

Discipline code repressive: SAC

The following position paper represents the opinions of the Students' Administrative Council executive. It will be presented for approval to Wednesday's mass meeting at noon in Sid Smith foyer and from there will go directly to the SAC as a whole.

During the middle and late 1960's, Canadian students in large numbers began expressing profound dissatisfaction with university education. Many were no longer content to sit back passively and choose courses predetermined by faculty calendar-writers, and then quietly absorb knowledge from a lecturer in an overcrowded classroom.

Students wanted power to shape the nature of their educational development. Many ideas were generated for reforms in course content and in evaluation techniques. Accompanying the requests for change came the demand for a significant, direct student presence on university decision-making bodies. Students wanted to share control of the dynamics which shaped their lives in university. The University of Toronto was greatly affected by the development of the student movement.

Administrators and faculty members responded in various ways to the movement. Some ignored it; some responded with outright repression. Most offered token concessions to students, small changes which didn't significantly alter the basic nature of the institution.

At the University of Toronto, the administration attempted to remove discontent by offering minor concessions. However, since they feared that this might not prove successful, they attempted to legislate a discipline code under which students could be charged if dissent got out of hand.

In the spring of 1968, upon his return from Harvard, then U of T president Claude Bissell wrote to the Students' Administrative Council asking that students sit on a committee to recommend modernization of disciplinary procedures. Aware of his motivations, student leaders were wary but agreed to participate in the discussion. In October, 1969 the Campbell committee reported and students were pleased with the thrust of its recommendations. However, the faculty were bitterly opposed and two years of discussion about implementation brought only stalemate. Then, in the fall of 1972, a new attempt to introduce disciplinary structures was begun. In the debate in the Governing Council and its committees, the most significant recommendations of the Campbell Report were forgotten.

Last June, the Governing Council passed a Code of Behavior and outlined disciplinary structures to implement it. In doing so, it refused the request of SAC, GSU, and APUS, and seven of the eight student members of the Governing Council to delay passage until the majority of students returned to the campus in the fall. It refused students at large their most basic right — the right to be consulted before major legislation affecting them is passed.

The most fundamental fault with the Code is its vagueness which, in the absence of precedent or interpretation, leaves far too much freedom to the administration and to the judicial secretariat which will be hired to run the discipline mechanisms. This freedom could be used to implement a repressive system, stifling dissent on campus.

Events since last June have strengthened the misgivings of students. At that time, Internal Affairs vice-president Conway was willing to have recorded a statement that the administration would normally be obligated to consult the Internal Affairs committee of the Governing Council before dealing with non-violent demonstration. Yet the administration has steadfastly refused to support the inclusion of even such a weak guarantee in the formal structures. What force does professor Conway's guarantee have if the administration is unwilling to incorporate it into the structures?

The code has been represented by the administration as applying to both faculty and students. At the time the code was passed, it was noted that the Haist Rules on academic staff appointments apparently conflicted with the application of the code to tenured faculty. The administration undertook to attempt to modify the Haist procedures to ensure that tenured faculty would come under the new discipline system. It was found in October that no work had been done. Students are told that a change is unlikely in view of the "contractual obligations" of the university to its tenured staff. Thus, the tenured staff — three-quarters of the faculty — will be dealt with following the Haist Rules, so that students will have no say in the process.

The Code states that the university does not stand "in loco parentis" to any of its members, and each member is free to organize his or her own personal life and behaviour subject only to the law and to the duly established rules of the university. Implicit in this statement is the assertion that only actions specifically prohibited in the Code can result in disciplinary action. Yet it seems that the administration intends to retain the right to dismiss faculty for breaches of standards of morality. Moreover, students would have no say in this process.

These facts raise fundamental questions in the minds of students about the good faith of the administration in implementing discipline.

The discipline structures give to the administration and the judicial secretariat substantial discretion in all matters, and most particularly in dealing with demonstrations, determining sanctions, and in deciding whether or not to prosecute. We have no assurance that demonstrations will be resolved by negotiation, or even that a representative group will be consulted before disciplinary action is undertaken. The role of students will be restricted to determining questions of guilt or innocence. Since the penalties will be determined by others, the views of students about the seriousness of different actions will not be taken into account. A student could even be expelled for library violations. Finally, the administration is free to lay or prevent the laying of charges as it pleases. It may in this way stifle dissent by disciplining demonstrators or by harassing potential dissenters with minor charges. It may also ensure that faculty are protected from prosecution by students.

The discipline system gives great power to the administration. Because there is evidence of bad faith on their part, students can not be confident of the fair and impartial administration of justice.

For this reason, the Discipline Code and proposed structures are fundamentally unacceptable and will not be recognized by the student community at large or its representative organizations.

Disciplinary procedures neither arise from nor are implemented in, a political vacuum. We have already discussed the historical situation which gave rise to the Cadario-Conway Code of Behavior. We must also examine the conditions in which this code would function. Students have only token representation on those bodies which formulate the policies of the university, and mould the conditions under which they study. On staffing committees, perhaps the most important academic decision-making bodies, they have representation in only one department. We regard this situation as intolerable. In this political context, the composition of the committee which drafted the proposed Code of Behaviour is irrelevant. In asking students to accept the Code, the administration asks that we participate in disciplining our fellow students for offences which arise from conditions over which students have no control. This is clearly unacceptable. Students will agree to disciplinary procedures only if they emerge from a process of democratization of all university policy-making bodies.

Adequate student participation in all university policy-making bodies is a necessary prerequisite for new disciplinary procedures.

We regard the section of the Code which makes it an offence to "obstruct unduly" university functions as completely unacceptable. It has been demonstrated many times that, because students lack a voice in policy decisions, it is only through mass action that significant reforms can be achieved. The administration seeks to remove such actions from a political context and define them as quasi-criminal offences. We insist, on the other hand, that political disruptions be defined in these terms and dealt with on the basis of the political issues involved, as recommended in the Campbell Report.

Any disciplinary procedures must acknowledge the necessity of dealing with mass action through negotiation over the substantive issues involved.

In proposing the discipline system, the administration has discarded the progressive recommendations embodied in the Campbell Report. On each of the last two points, the report contained recommendations considerably more liberal than those in the new system. In anticipation of the reforms recommended by the Commission on University Government, the Campbell Report assumed that "students and faculty will be involved in decision-making at all levels of university government." This assumption has not yet been realized. The report also distinguishes among non-obstructive demonstrations, non-violent but obstructive demonstrations, and actions causing damage to persons or property. The report recommends that, in dealing with non-violent obstructive demonstration." While by no means perfect, the Campbell Report provided a far more acceptable framework for discipline than the new system.

The Campbell Report also proposed significantly increasing the rights of students in the classroom. It recommended that, before the beginning of any course, students and faculty should reach operational agreement on course content and method of approach. The recommendation would have altered the power relationship in the classroom, in which the faculty now have absolute rights over students.

Any discipline procedure must recognize the right of students to reach operational agreement with faculty on course content and procedures before the course begins. Control of students over their own education must be brought to the classroom level.

The present method for dealing with academic offences is both arbitrary and contrary to principles of justice. Under the current procedures, a professor can unilaterally lower a student's mark without proof if cheating is suspected. The procedures proposed by the administration correct the most blatant violations of students' rights. While we reject the proposed discipline system for the reasons we have given, we demand the implementation, on an interim basis, of a structure which will ensure the protection of these fundamental rights in cases of academic offences, which we define as follows: cheating on examinations, plagiarism (by students or faculty), discrimination by faculty in evaluating students, and refusal by faculty to negotiate operational agreement in the classroom. Furthermore, we demand that all faculty be subject to this interim structure.

'Serving itself in so many ways': a century of giveaways to CPR

By JACK VAN BUUREN
adapted from the GRAPE

Prior to Confederation, Canada's financial ruling class in both Upper and Lower Canada was worried that the entire country, particularly the West with its minerals, lumber and land, would be lost to the American annexationist movement. If this happened these men stood to lose a lot of money, and with it, power and influence.

An independent country was needed to thwart the possible takeover. The parent British ruling class in England was solidly behind the scheme, as might be expected since some of its members were senior partners in Canadian investment.

The English, together with their Canadian counterparts held a monopoly on much of Canada's land. They were able to form land companies and were then given millions of acres of Canadian land, courtesy of the British crown. (The Hudson's Bay Company was one of these companies.) And with the land went the desired access to lumber, minerals, and cheap labor.

Financial backing

The same group of men also controlled the only major banks existing at the time—the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Bank of Canada. Coincidentally, the provincial governments were also quite co-operative with the demands of these men, since the governments were comprised largely of the same groups of investors.

The scattered provinces and territories obviously had to be quickly united to halt the threat from the south, and a national railway (run by and for the propertied classes) set about to do this.

One of the first acts of Sir John A. Macdonald's Tory government was to hand over a monopoly charter for the railway to a triumvirate consisting of Donald Smith, who represented the landed interests through his position in the Hudson's Bay Company, George Stephen, who acted on behalf of the financial interests as president of the Bank of Montreal, and William Van Horne, an American entrepreneur responsible for construction on the project.

But as soon as it received the charter the Hudson's Bay Company, through Donald Smith, sold back large amounts of land to the federal government at a handsome profit. (Ironically, any price would have been non-profitable since the company got the land for nothing in the first place.)

The federal government then turned around and handed back $25 million and 25 million acres of land to the railway company free of charge. And the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it was later to become known, also received the already existing lines plus sections already under construction, as well as tax exemptions on all company lands for 20 years.

With its monopoly position, the company was able to sell land to the settlers at exorbitant prices, and charge high prices for all goods.

The CPR's land tax exemption was a further disadvantage, particularly for people in the west. The 20 year exemption was extended indefinitely, with the result that there were hardly any taxable lands in many rural municipalities. Neither roads nor schools were built because of the monopoly with the result being the lack of a taxable source of income. If services were provided it was only through a high rate of taxation on the small farmers. A further burden was the freight rates themselves—since the company was in a monopoly position it was the only means of transportation to the eastern markets, and farmers were forced to pay incredibly high freight and shipping charges.

Imported labor to build the railway

American entrepreneur Van Horne bought 8,000 Chinese "coolies" to help construct the CPR line. These Chinese workers constituted half the work force on the railway line, and were also paid half the wages of Canadian workers. While the company was to make millions from the railway's operation and related enterprises, the workers who actually built the line were paid $2 per day; filthy working conditions, poor quality food, and a higher than-average death rate were other benefits of the job.

And despite its financial backing and accrued wealth the company continued to borrow money from the government. One price for a hefty loan was the transportation of troops to the west from Ontario to put down the Riel Rebellion.

So it went until the line was completed and a financial and transportation network had been effectively set up to exploit Canada's riches (including labor).

Canada's national railway formed at a high price

Not until 1923 did a second Canada-wide national railway struggle to develop. The federal government bought rail lines which were already going bankrupt for an extremely high price and along with them incurred the debts for these lines.

The lines eventually were consolidated into the Canadian National Railway, which became publicly owned, not by choice, but because of the high cost involved—no private entrepreneur would touch it. Although the company did fairly well in its initial years, it never posed a serious threat to the CPR.

During the depression, CNR earnings fell by 50 per cent through losses in passenger and freight traffic and the company fell a long way behind the CPR. When officials of the CPR recommended to a royal commission that the two line amalgamate, pressure from western interests defeated the proposal. The government was then forced to reorganize and pump more money into the CNR.

CPR booms after World War II

The second world war provided a "boom" economy. Rapid industrial growth (largely as a result of the penetration of American capital, raw materials, armaments and manpower) were there for the making and taking. And the CPR did a lot of the taking, carrying troops, munitions and foodstuffs and industrial goods across Canada and abroad. (by this time the CPR had already expanded into the air—Canadian Pacific Airlines, and onto the seas—Canadian Pacific Steamships.)

Natural resources field opens up

But the one weak spot in the profit-making operation had been rail passenger service. To offset this the company sold much of its land during the 1940's and 1950's. However, they were careful to maintain the rights to minerals below the lands, and the company's mining and smelting properties quickly grew, particularly in Trail and Kimberley. Their mine holdings became formally known as the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, or, more recently, Cominco.

With a boom in the oil fields, the company received royalties and rent in kind from the oil companies (mostly American) which had originally purchased the land from them. Finally, in the 1950's the CPR started its own drilling operations in Alberta, and it is presently operating in the Northwest Territories.

The company's hotel properties also increased and the company has now, through acquisitions, built up a coast-to-coast chain. Profits during 1972 from the hotel interest alone totalled almost $3 million.

But the company has been careful not to sell all its lands, and owns valuable urban holdings in all major Canadian cities. In fact, Canadian Pacific Limited had to set up Marathon Realty Company Limited to manage and develop its real estate interests. Marathon is presently planning a $200 million scheme to develop the Vancouver waterfront.

By 1962 the company and its various holdings had increased to such an extent that it had to set up a separate company—Canadian Pacific Investments Ltd.—to handle all the non-transportation aspects of its operation.

Rail passenger service down

Lack of profits from passenger service has always been a sore spot for Canadian Pacific Ltd. In a 1980 policy statement a company official stated that the firm planned to "phase out" all of its unprofitable services and scrap the equipment by 1980. But prior to the announcement the company had already taken about 100 trains out of commission, which caused a great deal of hardship to working men and women who needed this form of transportation to get to work. And in other parts of the country, particularly the north, it left people without any adequate means of transportation.

In 1961 the Royal Commission on Transportation issued its report recommending that the Federal Government subsidize the rail companies for loss of profits in passenger service. The second major recommendation called for a lifting of all freight rate controls, and CP profits have risen sharply since this latter proposal was incorporated in the National Transportation Act in 1967. (The commissioners' recommendations were, in fact, CP's policy almost word-for-word.)

The National Transportation Act was passed by the Pearson government, while Jack Pickersgill, a close supporter of the company, was the Minister of Transport. The act allowed the railway company to discontinue passenger service almost whenever it wanted to, except in situations where the service was deemed essential (that is, mainly when Canadians voiced sufficient opposition). But even in this circumstance the company would be subsidized up to 80 per cent of "losses incurred".

The terms of the new act called for the establishment of a Canadian Transport Commission with the function of administering transportation policy. Pickersgill then resigned from his cabinet position and took on the commission chairman's job at $30,000 per year. To this day the commission's decisions are binding and it has the right to call for either private or public meetings. Decisions to the disadvantages of passengers have been made behind closed doors.

Services systematically eliminated

Despite the millions of dollars received by CP Ltd. in the form of subsidies, the company continues to phase out what remains of its passenger service. It has already dropped one of its transcontinental runs, and is now working on eliminating the second one (the "Canadian"). Although the CTC has so far refused this request due to public opposition, it has nevertheless allowed the company to do everything short of stopping the service altogether.

To discourage passengers, the company has consistently raised the price of its meals while lowering the quality of food served. The number of passenger cars have decreased, the fares have increased so much that it's about as cheap to go by air, and in many cases sleeping car service is no longer offered. If the trains are overcrowded the company has even been known to put people in the baggage car.

Railway system still unsatisfactory

The biggest change for the company over the past 100 years has been its increase in profits and holdings. Close ties between the government and the company, then and now, have helped the latter reach its objectives.

But one thing hasn't changed. Canadian people in 1867 and today—those who work and need to use the trains—still don't have a railway system that adequately meets their needs.

has been dramatic. The e up and break down ation—whether a city or a factory—and also according to cargo. For example, there are numerous regulations regarding where a car containing explosives can or cannot be placed—not only within the train but also in the yards.

New technology involving computers, radios, television, ground-to-cab radios, retarders and other devices, have led to the handling of a greater number of cars in a 24-hour period than ever before. In the CPR yard in Calgary, for example, the company readily admits that rail freight traffic handled there increased 80 per cent between 1965 and 1972.

The introduction of larger diesel-electric locomotives in both road and yard service, and the advent of roller-bearing freight cars, has resulted in longer, heavier trains. Compounded with this, the companies have reduced crew sizes from three to two men (a foreman and one helper). The reduction in crew size, coupled with the longer trains and larger tonnages, places much greater responsibility on the reduced crew, who received no increase in their rate of pay for this increased responsibility.

The danger inherent in a yardman's job is confirmed by the fact that insurance firms in Canada still place yardmen in the most dangerous category. And conditions become even more dangerous as a result of the icy conditions during Canadian winters. The winters contribute to yardmen losing their footing either on the ground or on a car or losing their grip while holding a car.

The reduction in crew sizes, the increased size of trains and speed-ups make the possibility of injury even greater.

Engineers and trainmen subjected to same conditions

Engineers and trainmen have been subjected to the same kind of conditions as the yardmen. Time for hot meals after eight hours work has been denied, inadequately trained engineers are being used on trains through the dangerous Fraser Canyon run and electric guard fences constructed to signal rock slides in the Canyon have not been maintained properly. Last winter six of the seven guard fences were regularly inoperative for a period of six months. Nine men have been killed and as many injured in the last nine years.

Safety conditions on locomotives are deteriorating: engine noise level is very high, seating is extremely uncomfortable, insulation poor, heating and cooling inadequate, toilet, washing and eating facilities poor or non-existent. Combined with long travel exposure (the average round trip is 300 miles in 24 hours,) this contributes to the high fatigue factor, thereby affecting safety.

Worker resistance

In response to the new rules (changed in June 1971), members of the Vancouver locals of the BLE and UTU organized a mass 'book-off'.

Although the book-off lasted only five days (rules allow for 29 day book-offs) the railway companies sued for more than $100,000 in damages against workers for 'conspiring' to withdraw their labor.

The national and international union officials refused to endorse the book-off or help in fighting the fines. Seeing no help coming from the yardmen, trainmen and engineers organized a dues strike.

Harassment continued with the introduction of time-motion studies carried out by "spooks" flown in from the east, and through the selective use of the 'brownie demerit' point system which assigned penalties to militants for rule violations.

Supervisors began taking the jobs of men who were quitting or deciding on their own to take time off in the face of escalating harassment and threats by the time-motion 'goons'. The yardmen and engineers both fought back with a 'work-to-rule' but the union wouldn't even come down to the job site, let alone organize the protest. (They were too busy selling out the members over pensions in Montreal at the time.) The men then decided that if the union couldn't use their dues to fight the owners they would do it themselves.

Last May BLE union leaders decided to move to break up the engineers' organizing attempts. I.B. Spears, BLE's Canadian paid official in Edmonton, demanded the resignation of engineer local chairman Gerry Staples, provoking the return of the charter to Cleveland.

J.C. Coughlin, international president of the BLE, told one western Canada radio station over the phone that he would get the company to fire all 103 CN engineers. Once this news was broadcast across Canada, engineers in Winnipeg and Moncton walked off the job in solidarity with the Vancouver membership.

In an attempt to intimidate engineers even further, Joe Spears signed dues delinquent slips that threw 67 engineers, formerly of local 907 in Vancouver, onto the 'spare board'. This resulted in a complete loss of seniority and subjected the men to calls to work at any time of the day or night.

Subsequently, on July 15, 200 engineers packed a hall in Port Coquitlam, BC, to confront Coughlin, who had come to Vancouver in an attempt to convince engineers they should stay in the BLE. Coughlin found the men in no mood to play games, and they presented him with a resolution that stated they wanted to "set up a Canadian division of the BLE, completely autonomous, self-governing, and self-functioning, without interference from the international."

Coughlin replied he found nothing wrong with the autonomy resolution as written, but refused to call a Canadian or even an international convention to implement it.

That left the engineers with only one alternative: to organize themselves into an independent Canadian union. As a result, engineers in Vancouver and Kamloops have become members of the Train Employees Canadian Union (TECU).

Also, the yardmen and trainmen on both the CN and CP services are in the process of breaking away from the UTU and organizing themselves into an independent union.

The chances of the operating rail workers joining together in a union that the membership control and can use to fight on the job conditions and contracts aren't clear at this point. But they cannot have an effective organization without joining with the non-operatives in one industrial union.

How do you like the inside of the new caboose?

Many railway workers would disagree with the claim that cabooses are suitable for vacationing.

Rude smokers pollute everybody

Because I like to believe that people are concerned about the welfare of others, I assume that smokers inflict their habit upon non-smokers unaware of how offensive this can be. I regret that people continue to endanger their health by puffing on cigars, cigarettes, and pipes, but, they insist that they have the right to treat or mistreat their body as they wish. They may be correct... I do not wish to enter into a philosophical debate of this point. However, do they have any justification for forcing others to endure the clouds of pollution they pour into the atmosphere?

Throughout the classrooms of Sidney Smith there are "NO SMOKING" signs which everyone ignores. I have asked professors and students to please respect these signs, or, above all, to respect those who prefer not to smoke and who wish to avoid the products of those who do. Some people have been cooperative, and I appreciate this greatly. Others have been extremely rude. It appears that the members of this latter group do not like to have restrictions imposed upon them. What irony!

I ask smokers to please consider others.

Toike's racism is no joke

The Toike Oike, the U. of T. Engineering newspaper, published an absolutely disgusting racist cartoon in its last issue—including terms like "dago" and "wop". This kind of garbage must stop. It is the same as calling someone "kike", "chink", or "nigger", and it is no joke, especially to the victims of such terms. Many Italian students are really insulted. A lot of others on campus, including engineers, have expressed indignation at this slander of Italian people.

Unfortunately, the Toike editor still thinks it is funny. Last Monday, when a student expressed outrage at this filth, he just laughed. This "joke" (what's funny about it: anyway?) may not seem harmful in itself. But it reflects and helps to build a situation where real oppression takes place. The idea that Italians (or any other group) are stupid, inferior people to be made fun of, is part of an ideology that tries to justify racist practices. Just "laugh it off!"

Today in Canada, Italians suffer discrimination reflected in lower wages, being given the worst jobs, etc., and the attitude pushed in the Toike can only make people care less about it. No form of racism is harmless.

Perhaps the editor should be reminded of all the "funny" things that racism has led to—such as the shooting down of blacks in South Africa, the murder of black students last year at Southern University, or the killing of Jews by the Nazis. Racist jokes about Jews were very popular in Germany in the 20's, and helped build a climate that justified the inhuman treatment they later received.

There may be a temptation to write the Toike's racism off as the work of an isolated juvenile jerk of an editor. But president Evans has promoted an atmosphere in which these racist attacks arise.

Last year during Evans' inauguration, an engineer from BFC spoke in honour of Evans in a caricature of an Italian accent. Members of SDS attacked the speech, but Evans countered it. In a Toike (sic) interview, he said "It brought informality to a stiff situation... I must say the skill based on 'The Godfather' was taken too seriously by a few people who tried to imply racist overtones."

But it is serious. For example, Dr. Ian Hector of the medical school has a racist theory that Italians are "culturally predisposed" to play a sick role. In his role as consultant to the Workmen's Compensation Board, he used this theory to cut off workers' pensions simply because they were Italian, causing them extreme hardship. Who says that racist attitudes toward Italians such as those of Hector and the Toike are harmless jokes? Evans has also defended Hector in the last two Governing Council meetings. As well, he has been defended by Dr. R.C.A. Hunter, head of Psychiatry at U of T.

So the disgusting Toike Oike cartoon appears not only because the editor has a racist outlook, but also because Evans and other in the U of T administration have created an atmosphere that tolerates and condones racism.

We do not think that the majority of engineering students at U of T supports racism. Racism hurts. That is why we are writing this letter asking you and all other students to express your condemnation of this garbage. The small group that runs the Toike is printing it in the name of all engineers, partly using student fees. The editor has gone too far. Now, he is going around asking people to make up jokes about the people who oppose his racism as well as asking for racist jokes. He has been phoning us up, trying to (among other things), trick us into agreeing with a quote from Hitler, so as to print a distorted, dishonest, misinformed attack on SDS. And yesterday, a poster appeared saying "racism's a big joke!" It turns your stomach.

He should be fired, and president Evans should make sure that it happens, as well as enforcing a permanent ban on any more of this racism on campus. It would be the least he could do. We invite all students who oppose racism to attend a Rally on Wednesday at 1 pm at Simcoe Hall.

Quebec Libs won despite Varsity

Varsity's continuing support of Parti Quebecois is both repugnant and insulting.

Parti Quebecois has had racist, ultra-nationalist, undertones from its very formation. After the 1970 election Rene Levesque suggested that the level of Liberal support in the election results does not reflect the feeling of "true" Quebecois, since it is partly derived from the support of non French elements. Several PQ members have suggested confiscation of non French property since "les Juifs" are exploiting the Quebecois. After all if any exploiting is to be done it must be by the members of the pure race. At election times PQ has tried to hide its racist image behind a facade of token non-French members such as Paul Urtemberg.

During this past Quebec election PQ storm troopers swept down on several east-end and north-central Montreal area ridings systematically demanding that every non-French name be struck off the voters list. Those 113,000 demands for revision by the PQ are the demands that "foreign" sounding names, usually Italian or Greek, be struck off the list; the 74,000 complaints are from the people struck off by the PQ trying to get back on the voters list. Because of the difficult procedure involved in getting on the electoral list after being struck off, many New Canadians were disenfranchised.

The implication in the Varsity article, "Quebec, Watergate North", that thousands of PQ supporters were left off the voters list is ridiculous. Enumerators have virtually no way of knowing whether a person is a PQ supporter or not.

The article has the smell of Robert Chodos about it. A few years back he was the author of a great heap of malodorous trash and vicious lies published in the McGill Daily. Perhaps Chodos, in his own self flagellating way, would enjoy being struck off the electoral list because his name does not sound Quebecois. Does The Varsity suggest that people with non-Anglo-Saxon last names be prevented from voting in Ontario because they are not "true Ontarians"?

The massive libel, innuendo and smear campaign waged by Varsity against the Liberal party of Quebec failed to swing the vote in PQ's favour. You wonder why? Could it be that U of T is in Ontario?

Tom Ladanyi

Doesn't like snarky captions

In the past few weeks the Varsity's distaste for Bob Anderson's position has become obvious. True, little criticism of his policies has appeared. But in every photo caption a little mud is slung at his appearance and mannerisms. One day he is "shy". Today we discover he is "squinny" (squinny?)

If you disagree with SAC's policies please say so. If you are merely vaguely dissatisfied, and must resort to—admittedly mild—personal abuse, perhaps you had better waste less time on snarky captions and spend more on solid political thinking.

Female slavery is real, not funny

I wonder if the engineers had auctioned off black children in the same way as they auctioned off women at their slave auction in aid of the United Way, if there would have been bigger opposition to it.

The use of women in our society as both a slave and a sexual object is too close to home to me to be laughable, and yet also too close to home to men to be taken seriously, or so it seems. It is at the basis of most of their relationships and so particularly difficult to admit to, recognize and come to grips with. Our society manipulates and exploits women both within the family and outside as both consumer and worker. It distorts human relationships and allows men to treat women as incomplete beings.

The engineers in particular seem to have a peculiar brand of "humor", and frequently raid the SAC office to steal one of our colourful doors. They appeared to repeat this antic a couple of weeks ago only to be frightened off by a young woman who had been billeted there for the OFS Women's Conference that weekend!

Cops protect Private property

In their capacity of serving and protecting the interests of private ownership of industry, members of Toronto's riot squad are demonstrating better than any lecture in economics the class nature of the Canadian economy—the collusion of owners and their henchmen. The confrontation between police-scabs-bosses and the Artistic Woodwork local of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Workers Union (CTU) is characterized by police violence against a legal strike. Cops are not impartial public servants—in this case they are employing particularly repressive measures in order to ensure safe entry of non-union labor into the strikebound plant.

Costa-Gavras wryly points out in his film State of Siege the paradoxical nature of the economic positions of the upper class and the police. The capitalist class controls the productive resources of this society, thus exercising control over the government. Yet the police, whose role it is to protect the huge property interests of the ruling sector, is not wealthy as a rule. This is not to suggest that the cops are about to become allies of the strikers; on the contrary, these specially-trained riot police are imbued with reactionary ideas and convinced of the 'rights' of free enterprise. Like Hitler's NSDAP, the political arm of the police force is obsessed with the manipulation of the public.

The presence of strikers and supporters at Artistic Woodwork poses an irresolvable contradiction for the ruling class and its guardians. For them it is necessary to break the strike by effectively importing scab labour, thus forcing the union to accept an inadequate settlement. However, this intimidation must be accomplished peacefully in order to preserve the facade of bourgeois freedoms. But the unions and its supporters are militant, and resisting this unity of private property and the state. Repression of a small local of immigrant labor is not running to plan.

It is a truism that the police are doing their duty in preserving the status quo. When a cop firmly placed his boot in someone's groin one Tuesday morning, it was obvious to me whose rights were being defended. The Ontario Police Commissioner Davis comments that "... police controls stop where they run out of power. After that there's a vacuum (from The Varsity October 17), Cops Confer at OISE). I believe that it is our responsibility to oppose the power that he suggests.

Mass democracy harrows reader

On Tuesday, October 16, I underwent one of the most harrowing experiences of my life. I attended a "mass democratic" meeting initiated by the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist no less.)

In front of a prominent red banner displaying the message "support the Arab struggle against the US-Israeli aggression", stood six young men holding heavy wooden poles across their right shoulders in the manner of rifled sentries, at ease but on guard. At the end of these poles dangled red flags. Red, the color of blood, a passionate red ready to stir men's violent passions towards the revolutionary way.

In between these six young men stood a seventh, on a chair. He would introduce two speakers — a Palestinian and an Indian who would testify to the violence, colonialism and bloody fascism inherent in Zionism, that strange cause of a few million people which has been raised almost to the ranks of imperialism, fascism and even communism itself as a threat to the peoples of the world, by its enemies.

The Palestinian spoke evenly. If his analysis of the history of Zionism was not, it appeared to be strictly correct, at least his analysis of the aspirations of the Palestinians was illuminating. He was followed by the Indian, barely understandable, shrill and rhetorical. An introduction, I would have said, if I had not known what was to come.

Our master of ceremonies ascended his stool and promptly let us have it. "It is a fact," he said, "that the Zionists collaborated with the Nazis during World War II." The audience was stunned.

"It is a fact," he continued, "that the wealthy Jewish bourgeoisie collaborated with the Nazis to persuade the poor Jewish workers and petitbourgeoisie to go quietly to the railway station and board the trains bound for the death camps. In exchange, this same wealthy bourgeoisie was permitted to emigrate to Palestine."

The conclusion to be drawn of course is that this same wealthy, collaborationist bourgeoisie forms the backbone of the Israeli-Zionist policy today. They and their bastard off-spring, the new Israeli-born political elite.

"The wealthy Jews," I shouted, "went to America, not Palestine," and immediately I repented my exclamation. Of course the wealthy Jews were gassed like the others, though it is true that some managed to buy their way out of Germany before the war. I received no reply because the general uproar drowned my remark.

A thin young man bellowed "You dirty fucking slob, calling the Jews Nazis is as fascist as you can get."

"I did not," our MC raised his hands and bellowed back, "I did not call the Jews Nazis. I called them Zionist Nazis and the great Arab armies will destroy these Zionists, are destroying them, have littered the battle-field with their bodies."

His arm trembled as he flapped a little pamphlet in the air (perhaps it contained the facts of Nazi-Zionist collaboration). His voice rose to a shriek as he screamed:

"The Arab armies have once and for all, and forever, smashed to smithereens the myth of Israeli invincibility."

The myth of Israeli invincibility, whose myth is it? It is of course the Arabs who created the myth, in the same way as they created the myth of "valiant" Arab hordes storming across the Israeli frontiers from all sides to crush the weak and cowardly Zionist vermin, who would run from the Arabs' victorious advance, would run faster and faster until, the Arabs upon them, they would throw themselves like lemmings by the hundreds of thousands into the waves of the great middle sea to escape the righteous wrath of the great warriors of Mohammed. When that myth came crashing down with the full force of reality, the Arabs retreated into a new myth, the myth of Israel's invincibility.

It is to Egypt's credit that she has shattered this figment of her imagination, but it is to be feared that the Arabs will not uncover these blinkers to the realities of the modern world, but will retreat again, perhaps behind the old myth, one of the most popular versions being the white-robed Arab galloping across the clouds overtaking a jet fighter.

Fighting wars to smash myths is a dubious way to win honor, and of course, myths being myths and war being war, it is unlikely that Egypt will ever win a war this way, or equally, honor. Indeed, Egypt's compulsive need to fight Israel, even though she knows that she cannot defeat her, remains, the greatest mark of esteem that Egypt could possibly bestow upon this small and bewildered country.

Egypt has her historical and psychological reasons for wishing to create and destroy this myth. What is our ranting speaker's excuse? He has none. Self-righteous, banal and ignorant, he praised the Egyptian advance.

"Smash the myth, smash the Zionists, see their bodies litter the battlefields of Sinai." He shouted this as though reading tomorrow's headlines. "Destroy the Israeli army and may a democratic, secular state be set up where Jew and Arab will be brothers."

What Jews? If the Israeli army is destroyed, there will be no Jews. For the corpses that our banal friend so proudly views are young Israeli Jews. And he knows as well as I that practically every Israeli Jewish male under the age of 35 is fighting in the Zionist army. If all the Zionist soldiers are to litter the wastes of Sinai, Israel will be in fact emasculated. To be fair to our poor friend, perhaps he did not think of this. When we become overheated our rantings often take on a logic all their own, which, when taken to their inexorable conclusion, leave us stunned.

But our friend did not look like he would be stunned. In his final words at this "mass democratic" meeting, he began to spin his very own myth.

"I have spoken three hours, with a handful of communists in the room. Heckled by hordes of Zionists for three hours and still they have not succeeded to destroy this meeting. Does this not demonstrate the strength of the communists?"

Indeed, it does if he is to lead them. His sentries seemed ready to follow.

Need class unity in Mideast

Controversy over the Mideast continues to rage. Supporters line up behind their respective sides, pro-Arab, pro-Israeli.

Despite the subjective feelings of the participants, who may think they are fighting for "the survival of the Jewish State", "the liberation of occupied lands", or "the rights of the Palestinian people", the conflict is in reality a proxy war over which set of imperialist masters will rule the Mideast. We have seen in recent days how the US and the Soviets turn the fighting on and off like a tap according to their wishes.

There is some sign of declining American power in that Egypt felt confident enough (probably with Soviet agreement) to attempt removing the Israeli militarists from the east bank of the Suez Canal. For the oil mad imperialists to wage war they require the strongest national and religious fervor to mesmerize the masses who must go and do the dying.

Israel has acted as a military brake on Arab nationalist leaders' desires to obtain a larger share of the oil profits for themselves (not their people of course).

The resulting military conflicts with all their hateful propaganda have allowed local nationalists to divide workers and divert attention from serious economic conditions at home.

It was the nationalist leaders with the backing imperialists that either killed or jailed communists in the Mideast who were threatening to create a multi-racial, socialist state. Thus nationalism and racism have served the imperialists well.

In the future the US may find the Israeli military-racist colony more of a liability than an asset, and leave them to the mercy of Arab nationalists. But Arab workers also will find that destroying Israel will leave them no better off.

The sight in Sid Smith foyer last week of Jewish and Arab students, many of whom hold progressive views in common, shouting racist-nationalist slogans at each other shows the dead end they have been led into.

The only way out for Jewish and Arab workers and students is class unity against all of the rulers in the Mideast and their masters.

Non-citizen barred from Gov Council

Being disqualified from running for Governing Council of U. of T. because I am not a Canadian citizen was particularly ironic for me. The section of The University of Toronto Act, 1971 which ruled me as unfit to run reads: "Any person nominated as a candidate must be a Canadian citizen at the time of nomination if his candidacy is to be acceptable."

This arbitrary rule, enacted by the Ontario legislature, is racist because it discriminates against a section of the university community on the basis of the racial background, or rather because they do not belong to the race or nation known as Canada. Brought in at a time when there was a lot of talk about the need to limit the numbers of American professors, it was no doubt considered progressive, but were it designed to limit the numbers of Jewish professors on Council, one would not hesitate to call it anti-Semitic. In my case, the rule seems particularly moronic since, having been in Canada for five years as an immigrant, I could become a Canadian if I wished. What bearing such an act would have upon my ability to serve on Council remains a mystery.

All of this appears ironic given the fact that the main reason for my running was a wish to combat racist ideology in the university. During the past five years a number of academics, particularly in the US have made a concerted effort to resurrect the notion that blacks are intellectually inferior to whites. The argument takes two main forms: a genetic explanation stating that low IQ in blacks is passed on through heredity—propagated by Arthur Jensen of Harvard. Alternatively, a cultural explanation that focuses on the 'cultural inferiority' of blacks and other racial groups. Clark Bereiter, now Professor of Applied Psychology at OISE, was co-author of a study along such lines that concluded that black ghetto children suffer from "verbal deprivation". Furthermore, he claimed that "the language of culturally deprived children...is not merely an underdeveloped version of standard English, but it is a basically non-logical mode of expressive behaviour". In Pre-School Children Today (New York, 1966). As with all these studies, it has a very dubious quasi-scientific methodology that flies in the face of substantial evidence denying the truth of its findings. Linguist William Labov, for example, has pointed out that "the concept of verbal deprivation has no basis in social reality: in fact, Negro children in the urban ghettos receive a great deal of verbal stimulation, hear more well-formed sentences than middle-class children and participate fully in a highly verbal culture." In Language and Cultural Diversity in American Education (Englewood Cliffs, 1972 p. 226). What is more, it is the use to which such theories as Bereiter's are put that should warn us of their viciously racist nature. Ian Hector, a member of the medical faculty at U of T and formerly hired by the Workmen's Compensation Board, as consultant referred to Italian workers as "culturally predisposed" to feigning injury, which resulted in numbers of them having their benefits cut off. As the theoretical basis for such policies gains more credence in academic circles, we can expect further attacks of this type to increase in number and strength. Only because of a long and concerted campaign by workers and students led by SDS was Hector fired by the Compensation Board. There is every likelihood, however, that he continues to teach such ideas to future psychiatrists who will one day themselves serve on the Board.

What, then, can students do to oppose such ideas? The university administration tells us that to attack professors for what they teach is to deny them academic freedom. What this ignores is that freedom of expression for them entails, in the above cases, unfreedom for Italian workers or black children. It entails, indeed, concrete cases of repression for such people and a worsening of their treatment for injury, or their chances for academic achievement. It ignores the fact that ideas taught in the classroom can and are put into practice in society as a whole. It ignores, in other words, the political and social function of the university as an ideological tool and training ground for personnel necessary for the running of the social system—but only to a certain extent does it ignore this fact, for one rarely hears the principle applied to professors who attack the system in their course. The principle allows for the massive funding of military research conducted at universities during the Vietnam war and of the eugenics movement in the US and Britain after the First World War. The question to be asked is whether we wish to allow "academic freedom" to justify a resurgence of that eugenics movement throughout the western world.

Blues' waterpolo team sank almost to the bottom of the standings in weekend action at York. Two losses and a tie left them in fifth place with only the top two in the eastern section making the play-offs.

They lost 10-7 to RMC, and 7-4 to division-leading Queen's. A sloppy game resulted in a tie with cellar-dweller York. Bob Peeling netted four goals, Jim Butler, Tony Rockingham and Nick Flengas three each and Jim Quince one.

Current standings show that Toronto must win all its remaining games to have a chance: Queen's 12 points; Ottawa 11; RMC 10; Toronto 6; York 1.

In spite of the cold and snow there are still some mad dog runners out there. Toronto A's finished fourth in an invitational meet behind Toronto Olympic Club's A, B, and C teams.

Brad Morley ran first leg on the 3.4 mile course in 16:44. Don Dwight was second with 18:03, Greg Lockhart third with 16:56, Paul Williams fourth with 16:56 and Bruce Kidd fifth with 16:27.

The Varsity B team of Matt Dunca, Phil St. Louis, Don Williams, Paul Lockhart and Mike Donnan ran 23rd. Eric Discolo, Rick Cathrae, Dave Smith, Rick Cunningham and Frank Johnson finished 27th.

Blues' intercollegiate teams start rolling on a crowded Friday evening this week. Hockey opens the home season against perennial contender York and basketball meets Ottawa.

In case you hadn't heard, Laurier successfully defended its Yates Cup by shellacking Ottawa Gee Gees 48-4 on the weekend.

Trin upsets Phm

By CHRIS ROBINSON

The biggest upset of the soccer season saw unbeaten Pharmacy bow out 1-0 to fourth place Trinity B in third division semi-final action.

Trinity started out with the wind and sun in their faces but largely dominated first half play. Stout defence by the drugists and fantastic goalkeeping from Frank Tonon kept them off the scoresheet until Dave Ma netted a penalty shot off a handball.

In spite of the field advantage in the second half Trinity seemed to lose all its initiative and Pharmacy pressed a vigorous attack. Now Trin's goalie Mike Onions was called upon for the heroics.

In the regular season the drugists prevailed 2-1 when Bradley split the defence for two lovely scores. This time left back Geoff Mason and left half Bill Young effectively muffled his threats.

Pharmacy's best chance for a tie came with two minutes remaining when Bradley finally broke clear, only to have back Al Tassonyi block his shot in a welter of legs and arms.

In the other third division semi Grads took better advantage of their opportunities to notch a 3-1 victory.

The whole game was a fast end-to-end contest, won by the Grads because they missed fewer chances. Their tough, stand-up defence yielded little enough for the plumbers anyway.

Poster scored twice and Draker (we apologize for the persistent misspelling of your name) once for SGS. For Engineering III somebody scored.

The final net Friday will be a fierce contest. Trinity was the only team to beat Grads in the regular season, after goalie Onions demolished and demoralized them with his kamikaze dives (health service records show three notches on his belt so far).

Both defences are stingy, but Trinity's chronic inability to score goals seem to be vanishing. No predictions.

Prostitution explained

By HEATHER SANGUINS

The "inferior position" occupied by women in the Toronto work force at the turn of the century "contributed to their entry" into the field of prostitution, Laurie Rotenburg stated Wednesday at an OCE lecture.

She proposed that prostitutes are "service workers", who sell their "labor in capitalistic society" and consequently are "exploited, like other women workers."

She stated most women worked long hours at "low-skilled, low-paying, monotonous jobs."

Economic considerations forced many women to become "full-time prostitutes." Others worked at it on a "part-time" basis "in order to supplement" their regular income or when laid off their jobs.

Proverty was an "important contributing factor" to their entry, as wages for women were based on the idea that they were secondary wage-earners—that some male was already providing for them. In the case of single women and deserted wives, of course, this did not hold true.

Rotenburg stated the prostitute is a "unique woman worker," as she sells her labor like any other worker, but also sells "her sexuality as a commodity."

The speaker said that "due to venereal disease, drugs (primarily morphine and heroine) and alcohol, the career of a prostitute is 'short-lived,'" and that her research shows that the accepted estimate is that the average prostitute has a career length of five years.

Rotenburg related prostitution and the double standard of sexuality or sexual activity, and pointed out that its existence supported the "patriarchy of the nuclear family."

She suggested that the "naivete" of a rural Canadian and immigrant British woman who arrived here contributed to them becoming prostitutes but that "social attitudes kept them in the brothel."

The speaker said "existing statistical evidence" proves most prostitutes in Toronto in the early 1900's were "not of European origin," despite popular opinion to the contrary.

Rotenburg claimed "very few Torontonians at the turn of the century acknowledged economic ones as reasons for entry into prostitution," but instead "claimed the chief cause" was "weak moral character" on the part of the prostitute.

Thus, 70 years ago, the prostitute was "looked down upon (publicly) by almost all of the people in Toronto." As her profession was "contrary to accepted norms of her society" she was considered to be a criminal" by it.

However, Rotenburg's research shows that "police at the time seemed to understand that prostitutes served a necessary social function" because of the effect of the patriarchal nuclear family.

Blues scrape by Ottawa Gees • Gees, shutout Carleton

By TOM SHENSTONE and MORREY EWING

Tom Watt's rebuilding ice squad visited Canada's capital over the weekend and came away with two solid victories, 4-0 over Carleton Ravens and 6-4 win over Ottawa U.

Friday night Carleton proved to be very easily outclassed opponents and this may account for the lacklustre, dull performance put on by the Blues.

The first period was uneventful, with but one Blues goal, (Davies from Ruhnke), and few excellent chances from an overwhelming 17-3 lead in shots on goal. Blues' play was sloppy, and only lack of Carleton initiative kept Toronto out of trouble.

During the second period, while the Blues got fewer shots on net, their control became more evident.

An early five minute spearing call on Don Pagnutti resulted in only two Raven shots on goal. Later, Pagnutti returned to assist Kent Ruhnke on a classic two-on-one break, Ruhnke making the final deflection to score. With six seconds remaining, Doug Herdridge banged in a rebound, unassisted, to give the Blues a healthy lead.

Throughout the final period, the play was faster but still pretty boring. With the exception of a pair of tough shots from the point by Raven defenceman Don Crepin, and two shots by Ruhnke, close in, the play was chippy and plagued by hacking. One was reminded of a rugged scrum.

Some perseverance by veterans Davies and Pagnutti, late in the game, resulted in a Pagnutti goal, rounding out the total. The shutout was notched by capable rookie Jim Campbell.

The Gee Gees' game, Saturday afternoon, presented a marked contrast. Played in zero-degree weather in an unheated indoor rink, the game was much faster: perhaps necessary for the players to keep warm.

The game opened with strong Toronto pressure, which weakened through the middle of the period. At the 12 minute mark, Ottawa barely missed scoring on a clean breakaway. However, four quick Blues goals, (Fifield, Ruhnke, Hopkins and Hews), caught a careless Gee Gees squad unawares, in the last five minutes of the period.

The middle period was Ottawa's. Although the Blues weren't incompetent, Gee Gees' pressure resulted in three Ottawa counters, and the Blues managed few real scoring chances. The action was fast and chippy, with end-to-end rushes, high tempers and unseen rule infractions common.

The third period reflected the entire game. Defensively, both teams were excellent. Offensively, both seemed unable to handle the speed of the game. Each squad survived double penalties, yet managed to score short-handed. In the end, superior physical conditioning and better positional play gave the Blues the decision.

Warren Anderson and Don Pagnutti finished off the scoring. Anderson, a defenceman, showed why he is team captain with generally outstanding play (also matched by the Hew-Fifield line). Moreover, Ruhnke was, as usual, a standout from amongst a team seemingly without a weak link.

Coach Watt described himself as "pleased" with the weekend effort and singled out forward Bill Hews and goalie Jim Campbell for special praise.

Erindale evades For in volleyball

This forester is a rising young man but his team still bowed to Erindale II.

PHE pounds Erindale in lacrosse, Vic slugs St Mikes

By MICHAEL ONIONS

In first division lacrosse, the number one and two teams advanced to the final as expected. PHE outjockeyed Erindale 16-9 and Vic vanquished St. Mike's 18-7.

The first semi saw Erin jump into an early lead. A shot by Geraghty deflected off the goalie into the net, after hitting the post.

The early play was rough as Erin set the tone of heavy hitting and several skirmishes developed. Erin continued to press and took a surprising 3-0 lead on a pair of goals by Sterritt. They were able to control play effectively by using their goalie at the point who held the ball long enough to set up one man for a long shot.

Their tactic of deliberately carrying the ball out of play when they could not work into good position, while maintaining control, made the early going boring. Some good saves by the Erin goalie plus a few helpful goalposts kept PHE off the scoresheet temporarily, but once PHE found the mark it never seemed to lose it.

PHE also employed their goalie to advantage, using him to set up plays as the forwards moved into position for passes. Once rolling, PHE came on like gangbusters, tying the score at 3-3 before the end of the quarter on goals by a pair of 7's Browne and McNeil.

Browne scored again shortly into the second quarter and from then on PHE never looked back, piling on four more goals before Erin replied. Erin delaying tactics back-fired as the goalie, after running the ball out of bounds, presented PHE with the ball and an empty net, which they graciously accepted.

After Sterritt netted his third for Erin, PHE went on a rampage (again) scoring three more goals before the buzzer ended the half. The score: PHE 11 - Erin 4.

Both teams settled down to play good lacrosse in the third quarter as they traded goals twice. Erin got the last goal of the period to make the score 13 - 7 in favour of PHE.

Once Erin returned to its (preferred?) rough game, PHE was able to keep the ball in the Erin zone for most of what remained in the quarter. Throughout the game there was an abundance of cannonading shots and cheap shots.

Erin looked dangerous in the opening seconds of the last quarter, hitting the goalpost, but for about the next two minutes PHE hardly let them touch the ball. PHE seemed understandably content to sit on its lead a just wait for the breaks in the last quarter, of which they found three.

Erin managed to sandwich two more goals between these PHE counters. The nearest thing to a fight all evening finally took place with only a little time left in the game. The resulting penalties incensed the Erin bench, who had been extremely vociferous throughout the game. Their Erin manager was fortunate not to be ejected when he threw a ball at the referee over these calls.

In summary, PHE dominated the game in most respects. Their coolness as Erin tried to manhandle them gave them a big edge as did the paly of their big guns, Browne (7 goals) and McNeil (4). Other PHE goals went to Sorbie (3), Bagg and Mehew. Scoring for Erin were Sterritt (5), Geraghty (2), Tallien and Wiley. Final score: PHE 16 - Erin 9.

The second semi-final pitted second place Vic against third place St. Mike's. This was a livelier and more interesting game as both teams kept to playing lacrosse.

Vic drew first blood as Young put his team ahead after a cautious opening by both sides, who were taking most shots from far out. Crupi tied the score for St. Mike's but Young's pair of goals gave Vic a 3-1 lead.

At this time Vic was carrying the play to St. Mike's, hanging on to the ball almost will, with Young directing scoring forays from his side of centre. He added another goal before St. Mike's got their second, as Gilkison scored off the face-off following a penalty to Vic. Vic added two more goals by Orlando and Young, before the quarter ended.

St. Mike's put on a strong effort to start the second quarter but a strong Vic defence kept them to the outside, giving them few clear shots. Crupi finally scored to narrow the margin to 6-3.

St. Mike's looked particularly strong while killing a penalty, controlling the ball well and forcing the Vic goalie to good saves. Crupi added his third for St. Mike's but Orlando and Young replied again for Vic to end the first half with Vic ahead 8-4.

The third quarter belonged to Vic as they put the game totally out of reach for St. Mike's. Vic's strong defence kept their opponents off balance, forcing them to shoot from far out as they racked up six more goals for themselves: two each by Butler and Young, singles by Dobbin and Philips.

St. Mike's put up a valiant fight throughout and Ferrick powered home two goals which gave his team new life. Encouraged by excellent saves by their goalie and cheered by highly vocal fans, St. Mike's pressed hard, but to no avail.

Vic blasted in four more goals by Young, Ralph and Butler (2). St. Mike's could only add one more by Gilkison, too little, too late.

PHE won the Dafoe the last two years by outlasting Erindale in the finals. This year they have a new opponent with a smoother, less violent style in Vic. During the season Vic slipped from first when they let up in games against lesser teams—PHE can be sure that no such gifts will be forthcoming in the finals, starting Monday night at 8:30.

Discipline: mass meeting

'Repressive' code to be discussed

Noon at Sid Smith foyer

The Students' Administrative Council is sponsoring a mass meeting on the Code of Behaviour at noon today in Sidney Smith foyer. The meeting is one of the last chances students have to organize against the administration-imposed Code of Behaviour passed by the Governing Council last June. The code and the tribunal structures have passed through the Internal and Academic Affairs committees and now go to the Governing Council November 22.

A statement released Monday by SAC charges that the most fundamental fault with the Code is its vagueness, which, in the absence of precedent or interpretation, leaves far too much freedom to the administration and to the judicial secretariat which will be hired to run the discipline mechanisms.

In passing the code last June, the Governing Council refused the request of the SAC, the Graduate Students' Union, and the Association of Part-time Students and seven of the eight student members of the Governing Council to delay passage until the majority of students returned to campus this fall. The Council, in effect, refused students the chance to be consulted before major legislation affecting them has passed. The sole student backing the code was Internal Affairs committee chairman Paul Cadario who helped formulate the code with Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway.

According to the SAC position "Conway was willing (last June) to have recorded a statement that the administration would normally be obliged to consult the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council before dealing with a non-violent demonstration. Yet the administration has refused to support the inclusion of even such a weak guarantee in the formal structures" SAC then asks: "What force does professor Conway's guarantee have if the administration is unwilling to incorporate it into the structures?"

Another sore point with this year's SAC is the fact that while the code has been represented in the past as applying to both faculty and students, it in fact will now only apply to students.

The SAC paper states that "at the time the Code was passed, it was noted that the Haist Rules on academic staff appointments apparently conflicted with the application of the code to tenured faculty. The administration undertook to attempt to modify the Haist procedures to ensure that tenured faculty would come under the new discipline system."

However, it was discovered just last month that no work had, in fact been done. Students have been told there that there is little likelihood of a change since the university has "contractual obligations" to its tenured staff. This means that the tenured staff — three quarters of the faculty at the university — will be dealt with in accordance with the Haist Rules. Students will have no say in the process.

Furthermore, the discipline structures gives substantial discretion in all matters to the administration and the judicial secretariat — most particularly with those matters dealing with demonstrations, determining sanctions, and in deciding whether or not to prosecute.

There is no assurance that demonstrations will even be resolved by negotiation, or even that a representative group will be consulted before disciplinary action is begun. The library sit-in in the spring of 1972 is one example. Acting president Jack Sward failed to discuss with or inform student leaders before he called in Metro and campus police to evict protesting students from Simcoe Hall. However, the eviction and subsequent penalizing of students only caused the administration more grief. The next day 500 students walked into Simcoe Hall to begin a sit-in. Sward backed down.

Also, the role of students will be restricted to determining questions of guilt or innocence. Since the penalties will be determined by others, the views of students about the seriousness of different actions will not be taken into account. A student could even be expelled for library violations.

Finally, the administration is free to lay or prevent the laying of charges as it pleases. It may in this way deter dissent by disciplining demonstrators or by harassing potential dissenters with minor charges. And it also might ensure that faculty are protected from prosecution by students.

Although this picture has a lot to do with the strike at Artistic Woodwork, (see pages 3 and 4), it could also be a scene from U of T in the future — find out about the new Discipline Code today at noon in Sid Smith foyer.

Community: U of T planning creates paranoia

By DICK BRWN

University planning for future expansion in the northwest campus is "creating paranoia in the neighborhoods" an area ratepayer told the city-university liaison committee Monday.

Isme Bennie, of Willcocks Avenue just west of Spadina, appeared before the committee to complain the lack of community participation in the planning of a proposed new ice ring in Roberts Park, located southwest of Spadina and Bloor.

Even though university president John Evans admitted that "it was an error we didn't notify the west of Spadina ratepayers" about the plan, the issue brought forth the wrath of community representatives on the committee.

"U of T is the most fraudulent group of people I've ever dealt with," said Rose Smith of the Huron-Sussex ratepayers. Smith retracted the statement later.

"We can demand the community be involved in planning because we can save you a lot of time and money in planning," Smith told Evans. "But why don't we get information?"

Evans explained the plan for the second new skating rink was only tentative, and was put together by a task force for the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council. The committee's next meeting is Monday afternoon.

Smith said the university plans for the Roberts rink only came into the hands of the Huron-Sussex ratepayers — who are east of Spadina — by accident.

"We only heard about it due to a fluke — not through the good graces of the university. I'm awfully glad I'm not a student."

Doug Browne, of the Annex ratepayers, said the community should be consulted on all such plans. "Could all committees at the university be told to consult with the community?" Browne asked Evans.

Evans answered by apologizing that the Sussex ratepayers were overlooked due to "an oversight on my part."

Klaus Rohich, of the Huron-Sussex ratepayers, said that if any report originating in the university comes out, a copy should be sent to area resident groups immediately.

Ward 6 Alderman William Archer, chairman of the committee, offered to let the university use the facilities of City Hall to mail out any such reports.

However, neither Evans nor Alex Rankin, U of T's vice-president in charge of business affairs, took Archer up on the offer.

The proposed new second rink in the park has engendered considerable confusion among local residents, apparently due to lack of information from Simcoe Hall.

Bennie said she had heard that the university had already retained an architect who was already waiting the go-ahead to draw up the final plans. She said the community is opposed to the building of "an olympic size hockey rink on our last green space" in the neighborhood.

Rankin, however, denied that an architect had been retained for the rink. He maintained: "We have an architect for the Benson building, but we're re-thinking Benson so we might not do anything."

Rankin said that architect is not connected with the proposed ice rink project and even at that "he hasn't put a pencil down on paper" for the Benson proposal.

The athletics task force of the Internal Affairs Committee has recommended an addition be put on the Benson building to house a new swimming pool.

For the community representatives, this was the first direct word from Simcoe Hall they had heard about what architect is supposed to be working on what in the northwest campus.

Suspicion of university intentions surfaced earlier in the meeting when the committee considered what might have been an uncontroversial item, a two-paragraph definition of what the role of the city-university liaison committee should be.

No one quarrelled with the first paragraph which said that the committee should serve as an information sharing forum for the city, the university, and the community.

However, the Huron-Sussex ratepayers representatives strongly objected to the second paragraph which said the committee would have a policy of non-interference in internal affairs of the city and university.

Rohich was finally successful in having that paragraph struck out of the document after arguing that the city and university could gang up on the community and vote a controversial item "an internal matter" and leave the community with no voice in the committee.

Throughout the meeting, the ratepayers were critical of university policy, criticising U of T parking policy at one point and urging student participation in deciding about the Hoskin-Queen's Park traffic light at another point.

After the meeting, a smiling Alex Rankin told The Varsity that the meeting has ushered in a new era in community participation, but a ratepayer representative complained about the frustration of dealing with university bureaucrats who make decisions behind closed doors.

Dr. John does his best to look interested as community representatives blast university planning policy. Alex Rankin doodles instead.

Evans declines first move to restrict traffic flow

By DICK BROWN

U of T will not "unilaterally reduce" the number of parking spaces on the St. George campus unless City Hall first moves to restrict downtown parking, U of T president John Evans said Monday.

The comment came during a tense exchange between Evans and Alderman Colin Vaughan during a city-university liaison committee meeting which resembled question period in the House of Commons more than the information-sharing session it was scheduled to be.

Aldermen, students and community representatives peppered both Evans and university Business Affairs vice-president Alex Rankin with questions and criticisms about current and future university parking policies.

"I'm disappointed," Vaughan said. "The university might have stated as its first policy to reduce traffic in light of the energy crisis."

"If our worst fears are realized, and amalgamation happens, Metro may say 'hey ho, away we go downtown in our cars.'"

"The university would say: 'Hop aboard, we're for it.' But if the university is the only hold out of sanity against Metro that wouldn't happen."

"That's not our intention," Evans replied.

The debate centred around a document from K.S. Gregory, an administrative assistant in the university's Business Affairs department, which indicated U of T will transfer surface parking to parking structures over a period of time.

The document also recommended U of T "act in concert with others" to provide parking spaces "consistent with the established municipal policies and the availability of adequate public transit services."

Rankin explained that university "parking policy now will try to conform in the best interests of the city. We have been discouraging people for a long time."

"If you are discouraging parking, why are building parking structures now?" asked SAC executive assistant Art Moses.

Evans answered that the aim of the construction program is not to increase the number of spaces but to preserve the present number.

Vaughan replied: "The university should be socially responsive—note I did not say responsible—and take a lead in municipal policies."

"The university should not be building parking structures—that institutes parking. Once built, the policy is formalized and cannot be changed and you are blocked in the policy forever."

He said the Gregory document calls for parking structures but no reduction in parking spaces, but Evans answered the document "implies a reduction" while maintaining the current 2,700 parking spaces in parking structures.

Klaus Rohich, from the Huron-Sussex ratepayers, told Evans that the university policy is to maintain a parking level with "others" and Rohich wondered what would happen if those undefined "others" demanded an increase in parking.

Evans dodged the issue by replying: "If the municipality moved to reduce parking, we will follow. But we will not unilaterally reduce parking if transit is not adequate."

However, Vaughan earlier argued that "U of T has the best transit in the city," and Alderman William Kilbourn suggested that the university should spell out exactly which transit lines are inadequate at which hours of the day so city council could request improvements from the TTC.

Alex Rankin sits and takes it from city aldermen and the community.

Vaughan told Evans: "The university can least say: 'we need cars in our work.' University pedestrians and cars move easily throughout the campus without the automobile. 'You don't have tools in your truck to take to your job there.'"

Vaughan questioned the whole philosophy of how needed parking spaces are calculated, saying: "What should be talked about is not the number of trips but the origins of the trips."

Car counts, he said, only make sense when one knows where the cars are coming from.

"I'd like to see the university take a lead in solving this harassing and difficult problem," Vaughan said.

However Evans replied that the problem is the number of spaces not whether the cars are there.

In the end, the committee voted to receive and file the university proposals on parking.

High school students protest education cutbacks at Queen's Park.

Students storm legislature to protest spending cuts

By DAVID SIMMONDS

"No cutbacks. Tax corporations." That was the war cry of one high school group as it marched down to attend a mass rally of secondary school students held yesterday at Nathan Phillips square.

The rally was called to protest the ceilings on education spending imposed by the provincial government.

The campaign is being organized by COSA, the Committee of Student Action, composed of all the student council presidents of Metro Toronto High Schools.

Yesterday's rally marked the fourth stage of the campaign against the ceilings. Initially, petitions were gathered, followed by public meetings. Last week, rotating walkouts and marches to Queen's Park were held.

The crowd at City Hall—estimated by organizers at 10,000—heard COSA spokesmen blast the provincial government for allowing educational standards to deteriorate in the last two to three years.

The president of Central Technical High School described one Grade 13 biology class which had 60 students. "We're not kids sucking lollipops," he said. "By God, something's got to be done."

COSA emphasizes that it is not affiliated with the Metro Toronto Teachers' Association. "We don't give a damn about their demands," said one spokesman.

Metro's 7,000 high school teachers last week voted 90 per cent in favor of tendering mass resignations January 1 if their demands concerning pupil-teacher ratio, cutbacks and salary are not met.

Vernon Copeland, a Metro school trustee, addressed the City Hall gathering. "You are the responsible ones, demonstrating that you care about your education," he told the students.

U of T SAC president Bob Anderson, told the high school students that "your struggle is the same as ours." He said that high school students will face the same problems as they are now facing when they enter university.

The SAC executive last week agreed to give the campaign $200.

Following the meeting at Nathan Phillips Square, students marched to Queen's Park, to demand a meeting with education minister Thomas Wells.

After standing outside the legislature chanting "Well's out or we'll go in," the students were finally told that a small delegation would be allowed to present their demands to an assistant to the minister.

Artistic violence mounts as over 300 picket

By TIM GALLAGHER

Over 300 pickets clashed with police at the strikebound Artistic Woodwork plant in North York as the Monday morning fracas brought more arrests and personal injury.

This marked the most violent confrontation between pickets and police since the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union went on strike August 21. Several people went to hospital with 12 others arrested and 16 charges laid.

U of T professor Paul Purritt, said he was "generally shocked at the level of violence... especially that initiated by police."

William Temple, a pensioner and former MPP, was upset and called police actions "a disgrace to civilized society."

He declared: "I've never been so disgusted and sickened in my life... and I've been in two world wars."

"Critiquing inaction by the Ontario government which has been asked to intervene in the strike by Metro council, Temple said "The government at Queen's Park is rotten to the core... this plant should be shut down."

Police charged the picket line after pickets surged onto the road in an effort to block cars of strikebreakers.

One picket was grabbed by two police and thrown against the garage door of the Artistic plant while police repeatedly banged his head against the door and kicked him.

Purritt said he saw one person "being pummeled by police." Shortly after this he saw police punching a picket and stated the picket was "definitely punched in the face by the cops."

However, Purritt was pushed to the ground and was unable to witness anything else. He said the next thing he knew people were calling for an ambulance.

The picket police were punching was lying on the ground unconscious Purritt said.

People demanded the constables reveal their numbers which were previously removed. The officers "sneered and laughed... said that their badges were being repaired," said Purritt.

Not all pickets were arrested during the initial battle with police. After the cars entered the plant, police pushed their way through the pickets, carting more people off to jail.

Purritt said that Richard Loban, an American professor who was only in Toronto to give a lecture at U of T, went with him to the picket and was arrested.

Loban was released and later said: "The police dropped the charge on the condition that I not sue them for false arrest." Purritt stressed that Loban was "falsely and illegally detained for four hours, delaying his lecture."

Most of the pickets were students and young workers who seemed little match for the police. Police sergeants were seen restraining their own men who at times got out of control.

Nonetheless, police didn't emerge from the clash unscathed. One worker bowled over several police while escaping arrest. An electrical worker ripped one constable's tie off and then pulled his fist back as if ready to strike the officer. The officer mumbled something and walked away.

Someone remarked: "If we had several hundred workers here the cops wouldn't even show their faces."

Unions represented on the picket line were: United Electrical Workers Local 531, Steelworkers Local 105, UAW Local 439 (Massey Ferguson), UAW Local 1967 (Douglas Aircraft).

Jim Porter, president of the Massey Ferguson local, stated: "We're not supporting the stand of this particular union (CTCU). We have ideological differences. We're defending the rights of the immigrant workers."

The strike has been going on for about 13 weeks. Little progress has been made with management and negotiations have broken down again for the second time since the strike began.

Vic exec snubs parity

By TRISH BLACKSTAFFE

Victoria University students will not get parity on the Vic board of regents if a Monday recommendation from the regents executive is passed by the full board tomorrow.

A spokesman for the Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) said what students mean by parity on the board of regents is an equal number of representatives from all five Vic constituencies: the United Church, alumni, faculty, administrators, and students.

The proposals put forward are that the Victoria University Act be reviewed by 1977; in 1975 the Vic board of regents go to the United Church General Council to request 10 of its 22 seats on the 43-member board be open to faculty and students on a 60/40 per cent basis respectively; that discussion of parity be tabled; and the Victoria University Act be reviewed by a lawyer with no connection to Vic.

Serving and protecting at Artistic...

Twelve people were arrested Monday morning in the most violent confrontation yet between police and strikers and their supporters at the Artistic Woodwork plant in North York, as over 300 people gathered at the plant's gates to prevent strikebreakers from entering. But Metro Police made sure by whatever means at their disposal, that the path was clear for cars of strikebreakers to enter. The result—several people sent to hospital, and eyewitness reports of beatings by police.

Workers at Artistic, members of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Workers, have been on strike since August 21 for union recognition. Over 90 arrests have resulted so far, leading to calls for a shut-down of the plant until the strike is settled.

Toike replies

In response to the November 12 Varsity letter "Toike Racism is no joke".

Once again, a lengthy letter has been written to the Varsity casting columns upon the name of the Toike, full of fallacious arguments, distorted facts, misrepresented opinions and a lot of complete fabrications.

First of all, I don't think you need subscribe the Toike as the U of T Engineering newspaper anymore. U of T students are not quite so stupid as you seem to treat them in your letter.

Secondly, in studies of ethnic difference, data will come out in a form such as eight per cent of Italian workers tend to feign injury, as compared to six per cent for non-Italian workers. (Figures purely imaginary). These data suggest that there might be a factor in the Italian culture which may predispose them to feign injury. This would not in the least imply that any given individual or group of individuals are in the slightest bit predisposed to feign injury; the only use this data could possibly have is that it might eventually lead to research determining why some individuals do feign injury more than other. Dr. Hector does not imply any more than analogy, and I find it disgusting that individuals who are sincerely interested in helping other workers, (both Italian and non-Italian), who do not feign injury but still have to pay taxes to the Workmen's Compensation Board should be labelled "racist" and have their research hindered by a small but vocal minority.

Third you state that the Toike's Italian Snow Tire ad is the same as calling someone "kike", "nigger" or "chink". Anyone who believes that it is the word that offends and not the thought behind it does not deserve to be in any university, and I am surprised that anyone in the SDS possesses the technical ability to run a Gestetner machine.

Fourth, you state that "many" Italian students are really insulted. "A lot" of others on campus, (including engineers), have expressed indignation at this slander of the Italian people. Could you elucidate on "many" and "a lot"? Or is it the same as when one of our reporters inquired of the SDS how many members you had and you replied "70 or 80 policy-making members at the U of T"? When our infiltrators came to your last three meetings, they encountered eight other people there each time. True facts.

Fifth, your blanket statement that articles such as the one in the Toike lead to racism is a very questionable point. Who do you choose to believe that this is a fact when you have no data to support your position? Isn't this sort of bias just as bad as racism?

Sixth, you should watch who you are slandering. Dr. Evans has so far ignored your inane mouthings-off. To say that he condones racism is far more unjust than saying any given Italian tends to feign injury. Asking him to have me fired and ban racist (by SDS standards) writings from campus is very reminiscent of the pre-war Germany you associate with Toike-style humour.

Seventh, I have never ever tried to phone SDS, much less try to trick them in any way, shape or form. I feel they do a good enough job of this by themselves.

Eighth, I find it humorous that the letter was signed first by Mario Tino and second by Dave Depoe, when we all know the letter was composed by Depoe and his eight SDS cohorts. Surely I am not supposed to be intimidated by this grade four rhetoric.

Canada's Dudley Do-rights fight 'crime' in universities

By CAROLINE and LORNE BROWN adapted from the Carillon

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police's Security and Intelligence Branch (S & I) has been an extremely important component of the federal force's operations since the force came into being in 1919. (The S & I branch is also known as the "Special Special Branch" and was recently renamed "Security Services".)

Prior to World War I, secret service work in Canada was done by the Dominion Police, assisted from time to time by private detective firms contracted by the Department of Justice and other departments of the federal government. While assisting the Dominion Police to enforce the War Measures Act and the Military Service Act during World War I, however, the Mounted Police began to establish an extensive underground network of their own. This involved mainly investigating, harassing and apprehending socialists, pacifists, labor agitators, draft dodgers, and "enemy aliens".

Immediately after the war, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police greatly expanded their undercover operations, and when the RCMP was founded in 1920, it absorbed most of the security and intelligence apparatus formerly under the Dominion and military police.

In the period of labor unrest following World War I the use of police spies became notorious in labor circles. Not infrequently the jobs of these RCMP spies consisted not merely of gathering intelligence on the activities of labor and political activists but also more provocative acts.

The RCMP was using labor spies extensively at the time of the 1919 Winnipeg General Strike, to spy not only on the strike organization in Winnipeg but also on the One Big Union (OBU) and other groups throughout Western Canada.

In The Living Legend, Alan Phillips boasts that the RCMP had undercover men in nearly every OBU local in the country, and although this may be an exaggeration, it is probably not too far wrong.

One RCMP spy who gained his reputation at this time was Corporal F.W. Zaneth, who later became an assistant commissioner of the force, specialized in infiltrating the OBU, the Socialist Party of Canada and other labor and political groups. He was instrumental in gathering much of the information and providing much of the testimony used to frame (in effect) the leaders of the Winnipeg General Strike on charges of seditious conspiracy.

The methods of gathering what passed for evidence against these people were both unethical and illegal. Some of the testimony at the trials was bought and paid for by the RCMP; one witness, a Ukrainian immigrant named Daskaluk, who had worked as a temporary special agent for the force, was promised $500 for his testimony.

Corporal Zaneth himself engaged in typical tricks of the agent provocateur. He would sell banned literature for instance and then charge the people who had bought it for having it in their possession.

RCMP goes after the Communists

The primary target of RCMP infiltration during the 1920's and for decades afterwards was the Communist Party of Canada. The number of agents employed and the amount of money spent watching Communists will probably never be known.

Sergeant John Leopold, we know, was one of the most successful infiltrators in the RCMP. Leopold joined the RNWMP in 1918 and as soon as he had completed his training began infiltrating radical associations. He eventually ended up in the Communist Party, claiming to be a house painter by the name of Jack Esselwein.

"Esselwein" became an ardent trade unionist and a dedicated radical. He was an officer of his local union and a delegate to the Labour Council in Regina. Soon he became the first secretary in the Communist Party in Regina and one of the most prominent activists in Saskatchewan. He was a confidant of the national leaders, and later moved on to work out of Winnipeg and Toronto.

He successfully spied on his colleagues for eight years before a series of chance occurrences in 1927 and 1928 exposed him as an RCMP agent. Leopold then dropped out of sight and was transferred to regular police duties in the Yukon. He re-appeared in 1931 to supply much of the information and testimony used to convict Tim Buck and seven other prominent Communist leaders under the infamous Section 98 of the Criminal Code.

Under Section 98 of the Criminal Code it was not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused had committed or conspired to commit the overthrow of the political and economic system by force. For merely belonging to an association that believed that armed revolution was justifiable a man could be imprisoned for up to 20 years. Thereby the Communist Party became an illegal organization and Tim Buck and most of his colleagues got sentences of five years in the penitentiary.

It is clear from the Bennett Papers as well as from Stuart Jamieson's study that one of the main reasons for prosecuting the Communist leaders in 1931 and later was to make it hard for them to organize trade unionists and the unemployed under the auspices of the Workers Unity League.

Immigrants closely watched

In addition to the Communist Party during the 1930's, the S & I branch was (and still is) active in dealing with immigrants. It was responsible for investigating, arresting, and incarcerating people scheduled for deportation and it was often the findings of the RCMP investigators that determined whether or not an individual would be deported.

The RCMP also investigated immigrants applying for naturalization and had a considerable influence on whether applicants would be granted citizenship. These activities gave the RCMP considerable power over immigrants and they were by no means averse to using this power to intimidate anyone with radical or even reformist political beliefs. In fact they sometimes even used their power over immigrants to intimidate them into acting as political stool pigeons in return for a promise of obtaining citizenship or escaping deportation.

An indication of how broadly the RCMP interpreted their mandate to contain and suppress "subversives" was the harassment and attempts to intimidate J.S. Woodsworth. Woodsworth, an avowed pacifist, was, throughout his life, a firm believer in peaceful and constitutional change. He even discouraged mass demonstrations on the grounds that they might lead to violent confrontation. Nevertheless, he and his colleagues did not escape the attention of the RCMP.

Igor Gouzenko reveals the RCMP in action

The 1940's and 1950's saw another period of intense S & I activity resulting from the defection of Igor Gouzenko from the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa in 1946.

Gouzenko had taken documents with him that purported to show that a Soviet spy ring involving Canadian citizens and diplomatic officials was operating in Canada. Some information had been illegally supplied to the USSR, but the way the case was handled went far beyond any normal apprehension and conviction of spies.

The response of the Canadian government to the Gouzenko revelations indicated that the authorities were not going to be squeamish about the violation of civil liberties in the post-war period. What the Gouzenko case and the hysteria connected with it did was prepare the atmosphere for the period of Cold War anti-communism that followed.

And the circle of people effected by it was far wider than those suspected of having committed espionage. An obsession with internal security developed, leading to the dismissal or forced resignation of scores of people from government departments and agencies on the grounds that they were security risks or might become security risks. Many more were either demoted or denied promotions.

One instance of a person forced to resign on the grounds that he might become a security risk was Stanley Rands, then an employee of the National Film Board. Following his forced resignation from the NFB, Rands was hired as assistant director of health education in the Saskatchewan Department of Health but the RCMP apparently tried to deprive him of that job as well. He was told by the director of administration that the RCMP had called to make enquiries about him. Fortunately for him the Saskatchewan CCF government at that time was not as fearful as the federal government and the enquiry did not bring about a second dismissal. However, it was a typical RCMP practice, which undoubtedly cost scores of people their employment and denied promotion to others.

People being investigated by the S & I did not have to be, and hardly ever were, informed of the fact; nor were they entitled to see their dossiers or to hear any of the evidence that might be used against them. And, one did not have to work for the government or for a company holding a defence contract to come under RCMP surveillance during the Cold War period (and later).

The tradition of harassment of Communists and suspected Communists throughout the 1960's up to the fact on the CBC national open Canada Checkup, in a debate authors since the publication of History of the RCMP, William commissioner of the RCMP, station calls us and tells us that so much, a dossier immediately despite the fact that the RCMP is a perfectly legal organization.

University campuses under surveillance

The period from 1960 to vigorous underground activity on campuses. That was the period in which for Nuclear Disarmament (CN) combined Universities Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CUCND) were active university campuses.

The main objective of the event Canada from acquiring and their tactics included mass not dissimilar to those of the 1930s. The S & I response to the period was to recruit spies on campuses and within organizations.

By 1962 many people were exposed to the excessive amount of spying on The Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), alarmed at the RCMP's freedom on the university campus the following resolution at their council meeting:

Resolved that the Canadian Association of University Teachers express its disapproval of questions concerning political or religious beliefs of associations of students and Members of the association not to answer such questions and that they are part of the security of persons seeking government.

Similar resolutions were passed by the National Federation of Canadian Students (NFCUS) and were registered by the Voice of Canada organizations which had been under surveillance.

Pressure from organizations in 1963 and a major expose by Katz in Maclean's finally forced the government to lay down stricter guidelines governing surveillance on the campuses and movement generally.

However, spying still went on. It was often clumsy that it occasionally brought forth complaints and embarrassed the Pearson government. For instance, the CAUT Bulletin in 1967, cited the report of a secretarial staff of a university who she had been employed by the Continued complaints and official concern about the effectiveness of Canada's security system prompted the government to appoint a Royal Commission on Security by an Order-in-Council of November 16, 1966. The commission's report was submitted to the government in 1968 and an abridged version was released for public consumption in June, 1969.

The abridged version of the report provided no comfort for civil libertarians, but at least had the virtue of some degree of frankness, admitting that the purpose of a security service was far broader than merely protecting the state against acts of sabotage or attempts to overthrow the government by force. Attempts by Communists to gain support even by peaceful agitation were looked upon as worthy of police attention.

The forms of Communist activity in Canada are varied, ranging from efforts to develop front organizations to attempts to subvert individuals in government, mass media, the universities, the trade unions, emigre and ethnic groups and political parties. Such activities are assisted by the fact that the Communists are able to exploit and exaggerate existing elements of social unrest and dissent concerned with a variety of appealing causes. Some facets of their operations are worthy of special mention. First, activities in universities and trade unions appear to be of special significance. Half the population is under 25 and activities in the universities will have a considerable effect on the national climate of opinion in the future.

Presumably the security apparatus of the state was to take a hand in moulding "the national climate of opinion in future years." It is rare that royal commissions are so accurate about describing the nature of the state in a capitalist democracy.

Canada and the United States treated as a single entity

The commissioners also assumed that the interests of the United States and Canada were identical and Canadian security measures should be planned with this in mind.

The commissioners warned that Canada must not allow her territory to be used as "a route for infiltration into the United States". This was especially emphasized in the area of immigration policy, with the implication that immigrants who could be considered politically undesirable in the United States should also be kept out of Canada.

The commissioners were critical of the RCMP mainly on the grounds that they were too inflexible and lacked the necessary sophistication to carry out effective security work. The report recommended a security service that would be civilian in nature and completely separate from the RCMP.

The Trudeau government has so far not dared to implement this recommendation fully and openly for fear of offending those who regard the RCMP as a sacred institution. They have, however, since established a civilian security section under the Solicitor General and taken steps to improve the political sophistication of the RCMP Security Service. Radicals should be warned that they are by no means dealing with incompetents when they challenge the status quo in Canada.

Disenters attacked and harassed

Since 1969 the RCMP has been more active in spying on and harassing dissenters than at any time since the darkest days of the Cold War. This results partly from increased dissent throughout the country since 1969 and partly the fact that the Trudeau government has been more willing than its predecessors to violate civil liberties, as it proved beyond question in Quebec in October, 1970.

One of the chief activities of the RCMP in the late 1960's and early 1970's was doing the work of the FBI and the US military authorities in keeping track of and often harassing draft dodgers and their supporters in Canada.

Like the Royal Commission on Security the RCMP assumed that what was good for the United States was good for Canada. There are many documented cases where the RCMP attempted to intimidate people who provided shelter and assistance to draft evaders and deserters who were legal immigrants in Canada.

One of the most notorious incidents of complicity with American authorities occurred in British Columbia on January 25, 1970, when three US army deserters who were legally resident in Canada were, in effect, kidnapped by RCMP officers and turned over to American military police at a border crossing with the connivance of local immigration officials. One of the deserters managed to escape custody and make his way back into Canada to tell the story.

There was such an outrage that the government was forced to appoint Judge Ernest J.C. Stewart of the BC County Court to enquire into the affair. Stewart found the actions of both the RCMP and immigration officials involved to be illegal. He also found that there "was liaison, if not active collaboration, between the RCMP and US military authorities."

RCMP surveillance spread to the National Farmers' Union

The RCMP has not confined its attention to anti-war activists and radical student groups in recent years. The Security Service spied on and harassed the National Farmers' Union (NFU) off-and-on during 1970-72.

Its purpose appeared to be to intimidate the NFU and discredit the organization in the eyes of farmers. Most of the RCMP activity relating to the NFU was carried on in Alberta where the union is relatively weak and the farmers more conservative than their counterparts in other provinces.

The main RCMP tactic was to interview farmers about NFU organizers in districts where they were attempting to form locals. These investigations had the effect of creating suspicion among farmers about the "subversive" nature of the NFU.

In carrying out their work the RCMP collaborated closely with Bob Cheshire and James Rowe, two prominent right-wing NFU activists in Alberta who constantly charged publicly that the national leadership of the union was Communist dominated.

James Rowe admitted to the Calgary Herald that he spied on the NFU and sent regular reports to the RCMP Security Service for a period of seven months. Rowe joined the Canadian League of Rights, an extreme right-wing group affiliated with the Canadian Intelligence Service, whose research director, Pat Walsh, has long claimed to be a former S & I agent. The RCMP has consistently refused to either confirm or deny this. The CIS is notorious for the distribution of hate literature.

Similar, though less widespread tactics were used by the RCMP in Saskatchewan where farmers in the Swift Current area were questioned about the activities of NFU organizer Don Kossick.

RCMP also aligned with corporate elite

The RCMP has also maintained its collaboration with the corporate elite against organized labor in the past three years.

The latest example was revealed in April, 1973, at the annual convention of the Canadian Society for Industrial Security. The Society's membership includes security personnel from 175 manufacturing and resource companies across the country as well as federal, municipal, and provincial governments. Companies represented include T. Eaton Co., and International Harvester.

At the 1973 conventions, held at Ottawa's Chateau Laurier, delegates were addressed by Assistant RCMP Commissioner H.C. Draper on the subject of "labor unrest caused by subversive elements". Ed Broadbent (NDP) member of parliament from Oshawa-Wiltby, attempted without success to gain entrance to the conference. Later Broadbent was unsuccessful in attempting to force Solicitor-General Warren Allmand to release the speech to the public. Apparently corporations could be trusted with state secrets but not trade unions. MPs, or the public.

Political neutrality a farce

It would be a mistake to view the RCMP as politically neutral servants of the state who throughout their history happen to have been used as an anti-labor and anti-socialist force solely because they were obeying the orders of a capitalist government.

Like all organizations of this kind the RCMP have a political ideology which has been inculcated into all of their top ranking officers. This ideology is reflected in the pages of The RCMP Quarterly, the official journal of the force, and in Scarlet and Gold, the annual publication of the RCMP Veterans' Association. It is an ideology which is violently anti-labor and anti-socialist and uncritically supports United States foreign policy and Canadian subservience to that policy.

Scarlet and Gold for 1968 carried a speech lamenting alleged support in the news media for "the criminal, the student activist and phoney peace-marching critic of Canadian and American foreign policies."

"The substance of many public utterances reveals a permissiveness given to left-wing agitators to voice their opposition to our democratic way of life, always with overtones of disrespect for the rule of law."

The 1970 edition of Scarlet and Gold denounced student leaders as a threat to the body politic. "They are the yuppies, the hippies, activists, dissenters—many with long hair, dishevelled wearing apparel, and objectionable body odors." The 1971 edition demanded government action against the "unreasonable demands" of trade unions.

One thing is clear. If at some time in the future a government is elected in Canada dedicated to building socialism and independence from the United States, one of its first acts must be to disband and disarm the RCMP.

of an RCMP undercover agent out in the open, sweeping up bad guys.

Richard Loban, an American professor recently returned from the war zone Guinea-Bissau, said NATO is helping Portuguese Oppression.

Guinea-Bissau frees itself from Portugese domination

By BOB BETTSON
Despite the efforts of Portugal's well-equipped army the newly-independent state of Guinea-Bissau is holding its own in the liberated areas of the former Portuguese colony according to Richard Loban, a professor who recently returned from a month long visit to the war zone.

He is one of the last foreigners to travel the whole length of the West African state of 800,000 people. Refuting Portugese propaganda that denied that Loban had ever visited the war zone, he showed slides of his travels to a Monday seminar audience.

Loban said Portugese control is now restricted to enclaves in the coastal areas and in the few larger towns of the predominantly rural country. The Party for the Independence of Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands, (PAIGC) has now gained control of over 75 per cent of the country.

However he explained NATO support for the Portuguese war effort against the new republic is enabling the Portugese to continue. "The people of Guinea are continually subjected to savage bombing with white phosphorus bombs that are worse than napalm," as well as chemical defoliants, he said.

These bombing raids were carried out by FIAT G-91 bombers supplied by Italy and assembled in West Germany with American components. "This demonstrates the international nature of the military-industrial complex. It's hard to pin the blame on any individual country," he said.

However, the new republic is gaining ground in its world-wide diplomatic offensive since the declaration of independence September 24. American PAIGC spokesman Salahudin Matteos told a Cinema of Solidarity meeting Sunday night that over 74 countries have recognized the new state. "It is only a matter of time" before Guinea gets a seat at the United Nations.

Though an application passed the General Assembly, it was vetoed in the Security Council by the US and the United Kingdom.

Matteos said that Guinea will pursue "people's diplomacy," trying to reach the people of the western nations who have refused to recognize the fledgling state.

"I feel it, I know that there will be no more misery in our country," he thundered. "Our fight is a fight for human dignity and a fight against the colonialist exploitation of the Portugese government."

Matteos said that the PAIGC is not against the Portuguese people. "They are 65 per cent illiterate and suffering under the dictatorship... and injustice of Caetano." Marcello Caetano is the dictator of Portugal.

Portugal is one of the poorest countries in Europe, yet it spends over 55 per cent of its budget fighting three wars against the people of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea-Bissau.

Loban said: "there are major cracks in the existing system." Though Portugal still controls the urban areas, he explained that they are facing military unrest and desertion from their army as well as economic ruin.

The Canadian Council of Churches is funding an assistance effort for deserters from the Portuguese army in France through the World Council of Churches.

The part of Guinea that is not liberated is running up "colossal trade deficits."

New anti-aircraft weapons that the PAIGC recently obtained have resulted in the loss of 30 Portuguese planes this year.

Matteos said that the recent elections for the new national assembly attracted over 58,000 voters compared to the total of 8,000 that voted in the elections held by the Portuguese. Louis Cabral, brother of Amílcar Cabral the slain PAIGC founder, was elected president. Amílcar Cabral was assassinated at the instigation of the Portuguese in January 1973. He had let the PAIGC in its liberation struggle since 1956 when it was founded.

War has raged for ten years in Guinea and Loban said that progress in the past year has been marked.

"But we're dealing with a nation that is speeding into the 17th century."

Loban said that Portuguese army is "demoralized. The only areas under control are fortified bases, major towns and coastal areas."

The liberated areas are now economically self-sufficient with over 200 schools in the bush areas Health Clinics and hospitals. Loban also showed slides of the network of people's stores that enable the peasants to exchange their produce.

However, Guinea is still in a state of war and the Portuguese are continuing their effort to defeat the PAIGC government. Loban said that without the continued support of the NATO powers they could not sustain. He said that he has seen wrecked bombers from the US. from Britain. He said that he has seen wrecked bombers from the US jeeps from Britain, French artillery and Swedish trucks as well as some weapons with Canadian components.

"President Nixon's loan of $436 million to the Portuguese shows the clear complicity of the United States in this struggle," he stated.

Loban argued that the significance of the liberation of Guinea is that "it is the first African country to gain independence through armed struggle. The cultural diversity has been used to build common national country."

He compared the harmonious relationships between the tribal groups in Guinea to the strained relations between ethnic groups in the rest of Africa. He attributed this to the uniting force of the armed struggle for liberation.

Loban also said that there is a conscious effort to modify the role of women towards equality between the sexes.

Guinea is the smallest of the three wars in Portuguese colonial Africa. Portugal only gained real control of the country, outside the coastal areas, in 1936, despite having "discovered" it in 1482. Loban said that Portuguese control has always been "a fantasy." They have had to wage a series of protracted wars against an aroused native populace since 1888.

He said that the PAIGC is likely to consolidate and gain support. "It is a different type of national liberation movement. They have had to create a more democratic, more adaptable movement."

"That is why the death of Cabral did not work. The PAIGC has a different structure. This guaranteed that a more democratic government can be preserved," he said.

"Portugal has made a last ditch effort to rectify the situation. In the last five years it invited western capital in... but this is too little too late," he concluded.

Watkins: We're a colony again

By WAYNE ROBERTS

Although US President Richard Nixon may have unilaterally declared Canada to be independent in a speech last year, Canada has been a junior partner of the American Empire since at least 1940, Mel Watkins charged Sunday night.

Speaking on the American Decades in Canada, the University of Toronto political economy professor and former head of a federal task force on foreign investment traced the development of Canada from colony to nation to colony. The lecture was part of a series sponsored by The Toronto Waffle.

The signing of the 1940 Ogdensburg Treaty which provided for joint defence of the United States and Canada, began an irreversible trend, Watkins stated. The process of integration has proceeded almost without interruption since that time.

The Second World War left a permanent legacy, he said, because of the Cold War which followed it. Although Canada has only played a secondary role in Cold War alliances, the Cold War cemented Canada's junior partner role in the American Empire, he stated.

On the economic level, the policies of Louis St. Laurent's industry minister, C.D. Howe, resulted in astonishing "sellouts" of the Canadian economy to the U.S. Tax write-offs and depreciations encouraged massive American investment. These tax concessions not only opened the door for American investors, Watkins charged, they greased the skids.

The "guts" of Canadian-American relations today, he said, is Canada's role as a resource hinterland. He cited the 1952 Paley report of the U.S. Senate which described Canada as a major source of at least 13 basic needs of the American military complex. This accounted for Canada's continuing integration into the American military apparatus despite the declining importance of Canada as a political ally during the current relaxation of the Cold War.

Reviewing possible sources of opposition to the Americanization of the Canadian economy in these years, Watkins dismissed the Canadian bourgeoisie. He cited a recent study by Clement which updates Porter's Vertical Mosaic portraying the entrenchment of Canada's "mercantile elite" and "upper class" in the American Empire.

He said the price of continued Americanization of the Canadian economy is an inefficient industrial structure, de-industrialization, the assault on Northern resources, the balkanization of Canada.

"The Waffle's day will surely come", he concluded.

Throat case postponed

No date for a trial was set yesterday when three U of T students appeared in court on a routine appearance on charges of exposing an obscene movie to public view.

What was to have been a date to set the trial date was postponed to November 27 when it is now scheduled the trial date will be set. No pleas were entered by the three accused.

An October 11 showing of the film, Deep Throat, at the Medical Science Auditorium led to a police raid.

Deep Throat has been ruled obscene in some US court districts, but there has never been a ruling in a Canadian court.

Charged in the incident are: Taras Babiak; Lawrence Weisbrod, UC SAC rep; and David Galbraith, SAC education commissioner.

Andras: 7-year job crisis

OTTAWA—Manpower Minister Robert Andras predicts at least seven years of famine for young job seekers.

Although the unemployment rate for persons under now is 10 per cent, Andras says the federal government will not do more than it is now doing to alleviate the grave job shortage.

He said in an interview this week that the employment crisis will not end for another seven or eight years.

Sylvia Ostry, the federal government's chief statistician, predicts that 2.5 million young Canadians with post-secondary education will be seeking jobs in the next seven years.

But she says there will only be 600,000 jobs suited to their education level.

Andras said such government-funded programs as Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiatives

Program have filled a demand for jobs which provide less money but more satisfaction.

He added that private enterprise must provide most jobs in the future—government will concern itself with breaking down barriers such as some employers' attitudes to young people, the attitude of some young people to work.

Women's basketball opens season at Guelph

By LESLIE McINTOSH

Friday and Saturday previewed the vigorous match-ups that will characterize the Ontario women's intercollegiate basketball season this year. The U of T participated in an invitational single-elimination tournament at Guelph which included teams from Laurentian, McMaster, Ottawa, Waterloo, Western, Windsor, York, the Hamilton city-league and the host university of Guelph.

The Blues started relatively strongly against Waterloo in what was only their second game of the year last Friday. Toronto took advantage of loose man-to-man coverage by Waterloo to run a free-lance offence and control the offensive and defensive boards.

The less-than-regulation size gym was suited to the use of Toronto's 1-2-2 zone defence which forced the opposition into many turnovers. However, early season lack of finesse and mental discipline resulted in defensive lapses and less than satisfactory shooting accuracy. Tougher defence by Waterloo tied the game at 18 points a piece by half-time.

In the second half, the Blues failed to obtain a comfortable lead over Waterloo who continued to pressure the Toronto defence with the addition of a fast break. With 30 seconds to go, Waterloo netted two free throws, which put them ahead by one point. After a time-out with only four seconds remaining on the clock, a pressure pass on an out-of-bounds play found co-captain Chris Crawford, who hit a turn-around jump shot on the baseline to win the game for Toronto 36-35.

Chris Crawford totalled 16 rebounds and 8 points for the game.

Sue Scott played an excellent game in all departments and netted 10 points. Other Varsity point-getters were Leslie McIntosh (6), Daina Zukauskas (4), Karen Edgar (4), Anne Williams (2) and Trish Beck (2).

After their close-call in the afternoon, Toronto appeared determined in their second game of the day to prove that they deserve to be considered strong contenders for the Ontario championship this year. The second round draw pitted the Blues against last year's OWIAA champs, the University of Western Ontario.

Toronto again started strongly, playing the kind of basketball that made them league leaders in the east last year. They were faced with a man-to-man defence against which they seemed to be able to free-lance with great success. Toronto overwhelmingly controlled the rebounding game with Sue Scott totalling 17 and Chris Crawford grabbing 10 rebounds, mainly in the first half.

Inspired by the success of the offence again by far the toughest competition in the university league, the Toronto defence came up with zone pressure which resulted in five and six steals respectively for guards McIntosh and Zukauskas, again primarily in the first half. The half-time score was 25-17 for Toronto.

The Blues' collapse in the second half can be attributed to several factors. First among them is the fact that Western's defence became 100% tougher as they demonstrated the come-back power which won them the championship last year.

Having failed to run a real offensive pattern for the whole tournament, the Blues seemed unable to do so when their free style of play resulted in numerous blocked shots and turnovers. Confusion on the offence disheartened the defence who failed to defend aggressively enough against Western's all-star players Beth Johnston and Paula Chapman.

Pre-season injuries to last year's rookie star Terry Knight and to intermediate-turned-senior player Pat Williams tied the Toronto line-up to 8 players as opposed to 15 bodies for Western. The second half statistics showed a drop in shooting percentage from about 35% to just over 10% from the floor.

A good effort was made in the game by first year player Anne Williams who scored eight points and fought for seven rebounds. Martha Williams played a solidly aggressive game grabbing five rebounds and co-captain McIntosh netted eight points.

Under the care of their manager-trainer Janice McKellar, the Blues will have sufficiently recovered by this weekend when they play their first league game against Laurentian who were the only team in the east last year to defeat Toronto during their quest for first place. The game will take place in the Benson Building on Saturday November 17 at 1 pm.

PHE, UC annex laurels in Mullock

By DAVID BAKER

The Mullock final featured the fine St. Mike's defence pitted against the explosive PHE offence, with the jocks prevailing 7-6 in a tight contest.

The SMC squad had shipped in and put a price on the head of the Phys Ed quarterback Paul Dennis. Their steady rush and deep zone nullified Dennis' quick release.

"Beefy" Muir and Nick Desimini sealed off jockey Randy Kearns' fine sweep. Only the draws and counters to Greg Ross worked consistently.

Although the respective lines were small than in previous years, the play was furious with the front fours predominating. Usually the field is a mudbowl by this time, but the good condition of the stadium plus weather above freezing allowed both backfields to execute perfectly.

The culmination came when Dennis stuck the ball into Kearns' arms; a St. Mike's lineman (who shall remain anonymous) patted Dennis on the shoulder past congratulating him on his play selection. Dennis thanked him deferentially and then slipped away for the first down which set up the game's only touchdown.

From the opening kickoff Paul "the equalizer" Carson was in fine form. He detected four infractions in the first three plays from scrimmage, propelling the Mike's to the jock 10, whence Joe Liscio (released on waivers from Inter-Milan) booted a field goal. Phys Ed retaliated with a single off a missed field goal set up by Terry Nedoshyko's pass off a fake kick.

The second and third quarters featured plays alternating between brilliance and ignominy as neither side could sustain a drive. SMC's Romas Kriklavicius would slash off tackle for seven, then PHE's Bruce Kenny would nail both the quarterback and the halfback before the hand-off could be completed. Joe Liscio hit for his second field goal and built up a lead that began to look insurmountable.

In the fourth quarter Phys Ed coach Stan Gal made what in retrospect looks like an inspired substitution. He pulled Dennis and inserted Nedoshyko at QB for a sneak on third down. He left Nedo in for the next series. The backs hit the holes and left him holding the ball.

Dennis returned and put together the only drive of the game. It was capped by Kearns' brilliant individual effort. He set off on another sweep, saw it was sealed off and accelerated into a gap in the waves of SMC cross-field pursuit to power through for the only major score.

The convert was missed on a broken play and the SMC squad tried to put together a drive with 2:44 left on the clock. Their efforts were in vain as a fired-up jock squad tightened its defence and shut them out, to revenge last year's Mullock final upset by a narrow 7-6 margin.

The second division final players seemed to be suffering from a number of head injuries, since they didn't even know the date. The announcers had their problems too, as the speaker system broadcast Fidelio. While opera lovers waited for the pregnant pause, UC abbot New's plans for an undefeated season.

New started out like it was a walkaway. QB Al Hess broke away for a touchdown after being hit infinitely. A convert and a single later Larry Goldenberg turned the game around for UC.

Playing in the injured Dave Pandey's slot he ran well and caught a TD pass from Dave Rose. Rose then

The Varsity—Brian Pei

UC's Larry Goldenberg looks surprised to be in the game. He regained his cool to score twice.

passed to Lorne Young for the two-point conversion.

John Newfett strongly enough to spin and drive to set up a field goal. For the gnus, Goldenberg replied with his second major score to leave it 14-11 at the half for UC.

The third quarter featured a cleanly-fought but thinly-veiled duel between Newfett and Young. Newfett parried with a TD. Young thrust to the two but missed the mark by inches.

Young slashed to the one on a long pass but called back for holding. Finally he nicked New's lead to 17-15 with a single off a missed field goal.

UC maintained the pressure steadily through the fourth quarter.

When Young finally willed the winning field goal through he drew blood. His 60 yard single was the coup.

Erin wins soccer, PHE crosses Vic, rugby series starts

By CHRIS ROBINSON

Erindale broke the three-year soccer reign of the Engineering team by putting a Lien on the Arts Cup in Varsity Stadium Monday afternoon.

Neither team seemed able to control the ball in the strong south wind on the larger pitch. For much of the time the play degenerated into a kicking duel with each side trying to put through the long ball for a quick chance.

Engineers started with the wind, but failed to put together any kind of coherent attack. Their best chance came off a long drive that hit the post and rebounded clear.

In the second half Erindale took the wind and displayed some of the close interpassing and control that was the hallmark of their play in the last two seasons. A free kick from about 25 yards out went into a mass of players and Paul Li was quick to convert it for the only score in a boring final.

Both sides displayed some of the best lacrosse seen in Hart House in recent years as PHE A vanquished Victoria 12-8 in the first game of the Dafoe Cup final series.

The game was a lesson in two vastly different styles of play. PHE used a controlled passing set-up that utilized the pick and the slot for effective close shots.

Vic countered with its favoured fast-breaking game and tight defence. Most Vic chances came on sideline runs and breaks turning into the centre at sharp angles.

Close checking on Phys Ed's big guns Jim Browne and Milt MacNeil worked in the early stages, as the jocks could only show a 3-2 lead at the end of the first quarter. However, they couldn't hold the floodgates, and Browne and MacNeil opened up for a total of four each.

PHE also proved that you can't key on a good team, as Neil Sorbie and Bill Mehew turned inside when the others were covered. Sorbie counted three and Mehew one.

Vic's only mistake may have been in shooting too little. Instead of quick releases they tried to work in and usually lost to a tough defence. The jock goalie looked weak several times and might have been exploited by a barrage of longer shots, as opposed to the Vic goalie who saved their bacon in the early stages.

Young notched four, Orlando three, and Butler, usually top scorer, only one for Vic.

The clean fast play was a real treat for spectators after the bloodbaths that characterized the last two seasons' PHE-Erindale finals. They meet again tonight at 8 after the second division final between Trinity and Forestry.

RUGBY

By NEIL SORBIE

The Jocks' improved playing brought them a hard-earned victory over an equally skillful Eng I side. The only score in the Wednesday game resulted from PHE's forwards winning a scrum about 45 yards out and passing the ball sharply along the back line to winger Melnyk.

He broke one tackle and went all the way to score between the posts, with Sullivan converting.

Trinity A scraped past Eng II 10-8 on Thursday. Knowles and Tory scored conservative tries for Trin with Knowles converting his own. Scott and Webster marked tries for the plumbers, but neither was converted.

Law finally rid themselves of the "Monday rugby blues" and defeated Eng II 8-0 on Friday. Watt and Dalglish scored a try apiece.

The play-offs start today at 1:15 with Trin A meeting Eng II and PHE playing Eng I, both on the back campus. The winners meet Friday at 1:15 for the Nankivill Cup, won last year by Scarborough.

Code rejected: student demo next week

By MARGARET ROBERTSON
More than 116 students attended a mass meeting Wednesday which decided to stage a demonstration at next week's meeting of Governing Council to protest the new discipline code.

A rally will be held at Sid Smith at 3:30 pm Thursday and the group will then move over to Simcoe Hall and the council meeting.

A motion to reject the Cadario Code at yesterday's meeting was adopted with only two opposed, but an amendment to reject all discipline codes was left for a later meeting after SAC president Bob Anderson pointed out that students' rights also had to be guarded.

"We must now work for something to protect students," he told his audience, whose feelings were running high against discipline codes, generally.

Anderson said the new code, in failing to maintain the need for negotiation, failed to deal with dissent in political terms.

He complained that in the clause in the code stating "it will be an offense . . . to disrupt intentionally, disturb, or obstruct unduly any authorized activity," that "unduly" is not defined and there is no precedent for its interpretation.

While the tribunal system will have student representation who will put student interests first, Anderson continued, the penalties would be imposed by "paid officials of the administration" who are not responsible to students at all.

Art Moses SAC executive assistant told the meeting that discipline, not an issue during the university's first one hundred and thirty five years, has now become one because students are interested in the quality of their education.

The 1969 Campbell Report, he said, "represented some worthwhile gains for students" and that SAC had given it "some support as a reasonable document."

However, the faculty tried to "scuttle it" because it deprived them of some of their power in the classroom.

Further, he charged, "when students want something, the univer-

Students gathered to condemn the discipline code. They will confront the Governing Council on Thursday.

sity finds consensus not relevant."

Graduate students union president Cliff Watson, in proposing the motion to reject the Cadario Code said that it did not have "the legitimacy of student input."

During the discussion period, the majority obviously felt that while the intent of the code is unclear, it will be used for repression. It could be used for harassment to effectively curtail the mobilization of students or prevent the emergence of student leadership.

There was much talk of "double jeopardy" for under the new code, in some cases, students will be liable for disciplinary action by the university as well as prosecution in the law courts.

Wayne Roberts, who claimed he was "the oldest graduate student now living at U of T" said that teaching assistants, now organizing, under the new code faced not only loss of jobs, but possible expulsion.

It was decided that a campaign atmosphere was needed. A committee which will meet early next week, has already been set up to study tactics.

Much of the discussion was dominated by representatives of Revolutionary Marxist Group and Young Socialists who said the university considers students a problem" and if student do not reject all discipline codes, the administration will simply "introduce the same thing in a prettier package."

Height by-law could quash athletic building

By DICK BROWN

A proposal for a new athletic field house which goes to the Internal Affairs committee Monday would be in violation of the city's downtown height restriction by-law which says no new building may have more than 40,000 square feet of floor space.

The 58,900 square foot field house, proposed for the northeast corner of Spadina Avenue and Harbord Street, is contained in the report of the task force on new athletic facilities on the St. George campus. The field house is one of two buildings recommended by the task force. However, the field house is the alternative recommended by the task force.

The task force report was released in early September just prior to the introduction of the height restriction by-law in city council.

The by-law is still before council and has not yet been passed, but insiders at city hall indicate the necessary votes are present for passage once the city planning the necessary votes are present for passage once the city planning board has finished its considerations of the new law.

The by-law provides that for a period of two years no new building may be built which is more than 45 feet in height or more than 40,000 square feet in gross floor area.

While various construction projects are up for exemption from the bylaw, U of T has not yet applied for one for the field house proposal. The task force report says:

"If approved in principle, such a field house would require more detailed planning and close consultation with the community, which at the present has been informed that no new athletic facilities will be constructed in the area bounded by Huron, Harbord, Spadina and Bloor Streets."

The first step to getting "approval in principle" is at Internal Affairs committee of the Governing Council. If Internal Affairs approves the idea of a field house, it would likely pass Governing Council with little trouble.

Since the release of the task force report, local residents have learned of the field house proposals.

Spokesmen for the Huron-Sussex residents association say while they did not expect to be part of the decision-making on the task force, so far they have been satisfied with the consultation the university has made with their group.

However, the spokesman indicated he did not expect the university would be able to build the field house at this time.

One area where the report notes a serious lack of facilities is for multi-purpose open space.

Referring to the 1972 Users' Committee which recommended a 28,160 square foot multi-purpose area over a proposed swimming pool next to the Benson Building, the task force recommends the "alternative" of the field house instead.

The swimming pool proposal, however, contains plans for a five metre diving board, and if a multi-purpose room were built on top of it, it is likely the total building would be in excess of the 45 foot height limit city hall's proposed by-law would prohibit.

No detailed plans for the pool and overhead multi-purpose room are contained in either report and it would be possible to build the multi-purpose building next to the swimming pool proposal on the Benson Building parking lot.

However, Business Affairs vice-president Alex Rankin said in a meeting Monday:

"We have an architect for Benson, but we're re-thinking Benson so we might not do anything. . . There might not be one building but a number of buildings spread out over an area."

The task force proposal for a field house suggests a 310 foot by 190 foot building "on the block bounded by Spadina Avenue, Glen Morris Street, Harbord Street and the lane running north-south approximately 150 feet west of Huron Street."

Community info—maybe

By JILL MacKAY

Community access to information about university planning met the general approval of the Governing Council's External Affairs committee, but the Wednesday meeting was unable to come to a conclusion as to how to go about it.

The stumbling blocks centred around when the community should be informed of plans being made and how much say the community should have in university affairs.

Committee chairman Ian Tate brought with him a draft policy which stated that any task force report or equivalent prepared for the university administration and dealing with a project deemed to affect the community be forwarded to the local rate-payers association.

According to Tate, U of T president John Evans allowed that the administration could "live with" such an arrangement, marking an advancement from his silence regarding a similar proposition put forward at Monday's meeting of the city-university liaison committee.

At that Monday meeting, Tate, Evans, and Alex Rankin, business affairs vice-president, were criticized by community groups for not informing the community of university expansion plans.

Ward 6 Alderman William Archer offered to let the university use the facilities of the university-city liaison committee to send out university reports to citizens groups neighboring the St. George Campus.

But neither Evans, Tate or Rankin made any response to the offer by Archer.

However, the specific terms of this new policy, which it is the responsibility of the External Affairs committee to formulate, proved difficult for the committee to agree upon Wednesday.

Professor G.R. Thaler believed that it was nobody's business but the university's what they decided to build but that once plans had been agreed upon, local groups could be consulted on how these were to be integrated with the environment.

Presenting the ratepayers with finalized projects will do little towards decreasing their resentment at being encroached upon said Betty Kennedy. "If you want people to co-operate you'll have to start offering them more than lip service," she said.

Kennedy felt that it would be an important token of courtesy and mutual respect for the rate-payers to be notified and invited to sessions in early planning.

It was a mistake, she said, to suppose their contributions would always be negative. "It could be the best thing that ever happened for the university," she said.

This could have the further effect of quelling undesirable rumours which cause most of the misunderstandings in such cases, said W.H. Broadhurst. The community should be at least informed of plans from the beginning and be assured of a voice in deciding the location, he said.

Barrett attacks welfare calls jails an anachronism

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Dave Barrett, premier of British Columbia, last night launched a hard-hitting attack against the social welfare system, charging that "we have ravaged people's lives with the welfare system".

Barrett said that our "capitalist oriented welfare system" functions mainly to relieve guilt, and provide jobs for the social work profession. Barrett was in Toronto, on his first ever visit to the city, to deliver the Faculty of Social Work's annual Sophie Boyd Memorial Lecture.

The former social worker told an audience of 500 that the major problem of the poor is that "they don't have enough money." Any assistance the poor presently receive from social welfare is "accidental". Barrett said his government was moulding a "complete change in life style" and a "complete change in the values and attitudes of the next generation" of people in his province. He devoted most of his speech to a blistering denunciation of the function of the human resources branch of government.

He told students that it was "crap" that they would lose their idealism once they grew older. The social workers is educated, he said, to hide his humanity.

"If you really feel it in your gut," said Barrett, "get out there and fight." He accused social workers of spending too much time analyzing their own motivation.

"Go into politics. Go where the decisions are made," he said. "There is nothing wrong with the use of power," Barrett himself has a master's degree in social work from the University of St. Louis.

The "tough guy comedian politician", as his press biography describes him, was a social worker in British Columbia before spending 14 years as an MP, and becoming premier of the province.

After blasting social welfare and social workers, Barrett attacked the corrections system. "Jails are the most stupid blundering places to put people with a problem," he said.

A girl's training school was recently closed, he said, and "nobody misses it." He called the corrections system an "anachronism", and suggested that it was perpetuated by social workers who did not have the courage of their convictions.

Canada's penitentiary system is ranked by the United Nations as 43rd best in the world, he noted.

The first obligation of the corrections system is to develop responsibility, he said. He proposed a system in which convicts are jailed only on weekends, paying for their room and board, in order that families not be disrupted.

In defending his proposal, he said that at present, we "don't respond in realistic ways to realistic situations."

The present system only "guarantees a perpetual supply of rapists and other criminals," he said.

The probation system, said Barrett, has run on a "catch as catch can" basis.

Barrett traced the problems of the human resources field to "a premier who was plugged into God, and another who thought he was," in reference to the previous minister of social welfare.

While in Toronto, Barrett also found time to talk to Ontario Premier William Davis, about "the weather." Next week, he flies to Quebec — his first visit there, too — to try and persuade Parti Quebecois leader Rene Levesque to drop his separatist platform and join forces with the NDP.

Barrett extolled the virtues of his own government's work in the human resources field, claiming to have reduced the welfare rolls for the first time in years. He said that he was not afraid to spend money on welfare, and would continue to allot more funds.

He also praised his income programme for the elderly, which pays $209 a month to anyone over 60. Handicapped people also receive the same amount.

His buying of a pulp mill, and of a paper town, he said was developing a "sense of pride for local people."

British Columbia premier Dave Barrett spoke on social work at Hart House last night.

SAC reverses stand: rejects discipline code

By BOB BETTSON

The Students Administrative Council decided Wednesday night to reject the U of T Governing Council's code of behavior. This reversed an earlier decision not to reject the code.

The council voted 21-2 with 3 abstentions to back the position drafted last week by the executive and printed in Wednesday's Varsity. The executive's change of heart came after its members decided that the earlier position of offering a SAC interpretation of the code was inadequate.

SAC president Bob Anderson was the key figure in drawing up the earlier interpretation of the code but said Wednesday: "The code allows the administration such sweeping powers that it is totally unacceptable."

Anderson said the changes SAC wanted in the code were so major that it is necessary to reject it.

He admitted: "At the time when many people voted against rejection there were no alternative proposals. Now our position is different."

The executive's draft statement offers three alternative principles on which to base any new disciplinary procedures.

These include students and faculty reaching operational agreement in the classroom on course content and marking procedures, adequate student participation in decision making bodies and dealing with mass demonstrations through negotiation over the substantive issues involved.

However the executive came under fire from Young Socialist Jim Upton who charged that the SAC position went beyond the resolutions passed by the Wednesday mass meeting, which tabled discussion on rejection of all disciplinary codes.

The SAC position is that an interim disciplinary structure to protect students' rights against arbitrary action in the case of academic offences.

Education Commissioner David Galbraith defended the setting up of interim bodies claiming that they would only deal with academic offenses and "there is no way these bodies could have authority on matters."

Upton charged that the SAC policy leaves it "wide open to getting caught up in dead end committees."

Innis SAC rep Mike Edwards charged that the new SAC position was "six months too late" and "doesn't get to the point."

However Executive Assistant Art Moses gave a spirited defence of the SAC position: "The operative section of the new SAC proposal is the rejection of the Conway-Cadario code." He said the "integral" part of the position is "students and faculty reaching operational agreement in the classroom."

St. Mike's SAC rep Alice Anjo said that the university can expel people without the code and that an interim system is necessary because "we have the CAPUT now and students are being expelled for cheating and plagiarism." The CAPUT is the present all-faculty body that deals with discipline during secret closed-door sessions.

The executive's position was also criticized for mentioning the 1969 Campbell report on discipline which Edwards called "a sugar-coated version of the Cadario-Conway code."

However Anderson said the point of referring to the Campbell report is that it was "agreed to by all the major estates within the university."

The Campbell report was drafted by a parity staff-student-administration committee of ten people in 1969. It was shelved after considerable faculty opposition to some of the more liberal proposals that were included.

A move to remove all reference to the Campbell report from the SAC position was defeated 14-5.

The council also agreed to endorse the mass meeting's motion for a rally at Sid Smith at 3:30 pm November 22 and a march to Simcoe Hall for the Governing Council meeting.

Services Commissioner Seymour Kanowich told the council that the Faculty Reform Caucus steering Committee had agreed to support the SAC discipline position.

Scarborough Student Council president Ross Flowers came under fire for his council's lack of a position on the code. He said that there was "no official position" and a Scarborough council meeting would discuss it on Sunday.

SAC agreed to support Stephen Salaff, a math instructor fired last year, in his bid to get an open hearing by a staff student committee on the reasons for his dismissal. They unanimously endorsed a call for his immediate rehiring pending the results of the open hearing.

Rick Gregory said that arts and science dean Bob Greene had conducted an investigation in the spring that "merely amounted to talking to math chairman George Duff." Duff was responsible for firing Salaff.

SAC also passed an executive motion to denounce the McGill Student Council for slashing the budget of the McGill Daily, the campus newspaper, in half. They reaffirmed the principle of non-interference by student councils in student newspapers.

The council approved a $1,300 grant to Radio Eridande to put up a speaker system, but Anderson warned that no more funding for Eridande would be coming except in "extraordinary circumstances". The SAC coffers are almost empty now with little contingency left.

The council tabled a motion to censure student governor Howie Levitt for agreeing to sit on the Governing Council's committee to review the U of T act despite a council decision to boycott the committee.

There are only three students on the 15 member committee.

A $300 grant was made to set up a SAC office at Scarborough on the request of Scarborough SAC rep John O'Donohue.

Student governor Gord Barnes was elected as University Commissioner without opposition. Alice Anjo resigned the position at the last meeting.

Code parley

Today at 4 pm in the SAC office there will be an emergency meeting to discuss strategy for the campaign to stop the discipline code.

The meeting will discuss tactics for the Governing Council meeting on Thursday November 22, as well as the mass rally in Sid Smith foyer on the same day. All those interested are strongly urged to attend.

No red Hart

The Hart House Chorus will not have to sing the Communist Internationale after all.

SAC decided to reverse its lighthearted decision at last month's budget meeting to make the singing of the socialist anthem a condition of getting a $1,000 grant.

The motion by Engineering SAC rep Tim Buckley (no relation to the late Tim Buck of the Communist Party) was passed unanimously after SAC president Bob Anderson lectured council for being "insensitive" in passing the motion.

Buckley said that some students in his constituency were "upset" by the motion even if it was intended as a joke.

The vote was passed unanimously as council members sheepishly retreated from their previous position.

Avid Varsity reader vice-president Stephen Moses watches the tilting balance of power.

Toike confrontation only divides students

Wednesday afternoon's "demonstration" before the gates of Simcoe Hall was indeed counter-productive to the student movement as a whole.

Although we by no means condone racism — we abhor it — the fact remains that to respond to a challenge with a fight at this point in time remains useless. The self-proclaimed "leftists" involved did more harm than good for the student cause Wednesday.

When women from the Revolutionary Marxist Group became involved in the scuffle in front of Simcoe Hall, they automatically assumed as much blame for the alienating experience as the engineers who red-baited them. Doesn't it take two to fight — one to provoke and one to react?

We can picture the key administrators gleefully watching from their windows behind the closed doors of Simcoe Hall, applauding the divisive demonstration — occurring as it did on the same day that a "mass" meeting was being held in Sidney Smith foyer to protest the "asburd" (as one faculty member termed it) discipline code. The student effort should be concentrated at this time in fighting the discipline code, not in fighting the racism of a student newspaper. The discipline code may be forced on us next week, but racism will be around to fight the week after.

While we agree that the SDS — sponsored Toike burning was delayed for over one hour so as not to interfere with the discipline mass meeting, we still feel that the incident lost more in terms of student awareness than it gained. Granted, it drew attention to the fact that certain engineers were laughing at the racist accusations as if the issue itself were a joke, but it still solved little, and served to provoke further reaction from the involved group of engineers. They loved baiting.

Don't mistake our pompous but gentle rebuke to the groups involved as another attempt to split an already-divided progressive student movement on campus. But we really think that they should stop and think about what they're doing instead of tripping out over power struggles, each choosing their own issue to fight on.

More and more students are alienated by the seemingly-mindless (to many) extremist tactics in a year when students are appearing to reject the violent approach to politics (which doesn't necessarily rule out non-violent confrontation). But let's allow the police on the artistic picket line and campus police reveal themselves to be the violent ones. Surely we don't need to prove we can fight as well as the next person? Do we really need this nonsense?

If students are to build any sort of struggle on this campus they're going to have to do it on a mass basis. The kind of extremist, vanguardist tactics we're now witnessing don't serve any collective cause, but merely adds to feed the "revolutionary zeal" of the converted. Isn't it about time campus political groups united on say, the discipline code, and really put some effort into their opposition, rather than dividing the student body. At the moment students aren't the immediate enemy.

Come on, people. Get your shit together.

RMG member Varda Kidd is so far left she thinks she's right as she scuffles with an unidentified engineer.

Course unions could mean power

Attempts to organize a cross-campus French course union this week may indicate a revival of a once-effective course union movement on campus. Unfortunately, in the last two years course unions, most of them located within the arts and science faculty have become dormant, seemingly exhausted by a and difficult, losing parity struggle with the faculty of arts and science general committee (and its various sub-committees).

As Don Forster's Task Force on Academic Appointments points out, some of the immediate power still rests with the departments, and especially with departmental chairmen, even if the vice-president and provost vests most of the final decision-making within his office.

For instance, departmental chairmen have significant say in how the department's budget is allocated even though all-inclusive requests have to go to Arts and Science Dean Bob Greene and from then further up to Simcoe Hall. However, the chairmen still have considerable power over internal budgetary allocation.

The departmental level is also important for hiring, firing, and staffing committees, and if students are to be successful in any concerted struggle for equal representation on the committees they must be prepared to fight a prolonged struggle at several levels — both through negotiation and confrontation — to force faculty and administration to concede to their justified demands.

Department committees also take on singular importance for their role in curriculum and marking procedures. At this point the faculty members have students over the proverbial "barrel", able to weed out any "disruptive" students through the deterrent of the marking system (and what it means for a student's career). The same committees also decide who teaches what course and in turn, who is hired to teach a course.

Course unions have, however, been in a state of depression and only vigorous organizing around specific issues will succeed in pumping some life back into the sapped bodies. In the late 60's the course union offices used to be where some of the tactical planning sessions for student power movements were based, now they are hardly visited. Gradually students realized that course evaluations weren't the "be-all and end-all".

And if students begin to organize around course unions the faculty reform caucus might begin to come to life again.

So what students interested in fighting for educational reform on the departmental level should be doing, we believe, is becoming more involved with the course union apparatus, and fighting on various issues within the department.

And students should also question the disciplines themselves and their value-orientation — at the moment most courses are little more than reinforcing mechanisms for what some of us believe to be a pretty screwed up set of societal priorities.

"Students are the workers of tomorrow", shouldn't we begin to determine some of the real decisions that affect our lives?

Sellout or fight, the social worker's choice

Dave Barrett's speech last night to U of T social work students should be one they etch in their memories for their entire careers.

It's about time politicians started to recognize the obvious and say so. Barrett did, and a Varsity "Bronze Star" goes for his statement that the biggest problem poor people have is "they don't have enough money."

A remarkable statement from any successful politician and it's even more remarkable from a former social worker. The social welfare system he dragged over the coals apparently hasn't blinded him to reality as it has for so many of his professional colleagues.

Unfortunately, Barrett is no socialist or he would have taken the next step forward and explained why there are poor people. As a social democrat he has done what only a social democrat could do — increase welfare benefits.

But as limited as that is, maybe it will wake up some of the social do-gooders to the fact that broken homes, drunken parents, juvenile delinquency, and Children's Aide, and the whole wealth of patch-work band-aid jumble are only symptomatic of the deeper problem.

Since it was his first trip to Toronto Barrett can't be expected to know that U of T Governing Council member J. A. Armstrong went to great lengths in The Star this week to justify Imperial Oil Limited's profit of $151 million last year claiming it was no more or less than other big companies.

But that's the point. A small handful of people in the big companies rake in the big money. It's a zero-sum game. If there's a lot of money for the rich, there's less for the poor.

Barrett is doing the humanitarian thing by supplementing the income of the poor, but in the long run that will change nothing unless companies like Imperial and others are made to realize their profits don't belong to shareholders but the people who's sweat produced the profits.

We give Barrett a Bronze Star. A "Gold Star" (for his forehead, of course) would merit if he took the next step forward.

But his advice to 'social workers to be' is dead on. Get into politics. Since social work deals with the casualties of the economic system, a social worker has two choices.

The first is to go along with the system. That ensures there will always be casualties and the social worker will always have someone to help. Terrible job security in an era of high unemployment is a cynical way of looking at it.

The second is to chaff at the bit. "If you really feel it in your gut, get out there and fight" Barrett said.

Don't fight exclusively for better benefits for the poor, although that's important as well, but fight for a basic change in the society which eliminates the need for the poor.

A good social worker should be struggling to change society to the point where social workers will be obsolete.

There's no long-range job security implied in working toward a socialist alternative, but on the other hand it's hard to imagine any kind of humanist wanting to preserve an economic system which guarantees human suffering.

Anyone with serious thoughts about social work has to confront that single question at some point in their career. Are they going to preserve their job and the suffering, or damn the job and work for solutions?

Articles submitted to the "opposite the editorial" page should be typed, double-spaced on a 64-character line, and signed As with letters. Contributions may be edited for space reasons; four type-written, double-spaced pages is the maximum length recommended. Op-ed pieces are published according to space availability, immediacy of topic, and relevancy. Mail op-ed pieces to The Varsity, 91 St. George St., Toronto 181, by campus or regular delivery, or bring them to The Varsity editorial office.

Opinions expressed on the op-ed page represent the opinions of the writer only, and not the views of The Varsity collective.

Recent events in the fourth Arab-Israeli war jar the Jewish memory, and seem to be falling into a pattern with other current events which are frightening in their implications. But one must be courageous enough to deal with the gnawing uncertainty, which is linking Soviet internal oppression of the Jews with their external affairs toward Israel.

Dimly one can recognize the enemy the Jews face, threatening their very survival — the ruling Soviets. What one must ask is: Do the Soviets have an official program for annihilating "their" six million Jews? (three million in Israel and three million in Russia). One cannot afford to wait and let the moment pass us by again.

An article with a quiet headline on page 12 of The Toronto Star (Tuesday November 6) reports the presence of Soviet nuclear missiles poised to attack the main centres of Israel. As of yet, no comment by the world community.

Whatever the explanation they indicate, to put pressure on the Israelis to accept their conditions, they are putting themselves morally beyond the realm of humanity. They seem quite willing to kill three million Jews to get their own way.

It is not likely merely to get their own way: it also contains a potent threat of genocide. What is the difference between Auschwitz and cities of Jews devastated by nuclear murder?

Is the contention so absurd? Soviet propaganda has for six years since the Six Day War been portraying Zionists as the basest element in the human race. Mark Gayn, Star correspondent in Moscow, reported during the war, on October 29, 1973: "An outsider is startled by the intensity of the anti-Israel campaign. The Israeli government is accused of butchering Arab innocents. Cartoons show Israeli soldiers as monsters... It is difficult to find a parallel to this campaign. Nothing as harsh has ever been said here of the Chinese. And even in the worst years of Nazism, the Soviet press had not used the language it is now employing to depict Israel." (Remember that the milder Nazi propaganda was during Stalin's reign.)

It isn't necessary to repeat statistics published in the mass media about the size of their force, but a mammoth airlift of soldiers was to be moved into Syria and Egypt perhaps to add these countries to their empire once their troops' presence was a fact. No doubt part of the reason for their hostility to Israel is it is a block to their imperial designs for the Middle East. But part can be shown as the consistent design of hatred for Jews?

The media also reported the actual wording of the note Brezhnev sent to Nixon, described by Senator Henry Jackson as "brutal." It threatened unequivocally "the destruction of Israel." Like Nazi threats and Arab threats, the Jews cannot afford to dismiss Soviet threats as idle; even if it doesn't tie it to the direct military threat posed by nuclear bombs.

The "drift" of Soviet news engineers for the last six years has been clear. A propaganda of hate has been developed, using the Nazi technique of the Big Lie (i.e. if you repeat something often enough to people, eventually they'll believe it, even if it's a complete fabrication or a reversal of the truth). With it is a return to the Middle Ages, and Soviet Jewbaiting has reached vicious proportions surpassing even the Nazis. (Refer to the careful documentation of Emanuel Litvinoff in "Soviet Jewbaiting — The Propaganda of Hate", published in

Soviets threaten Israel's survival

November of 1972, a year preceding the fourth war.)

The Soviets proceed to cover their intentions by "exposing" the sinister Jewish plot to seize control of the world and kill everyone else, called Zionism.

"International Jewry" is now called "International Zionism", but the face beneath the mask is the same. Judaism is depicted as a criminal conspiracy tied to the Zionist plotters.

As one example of the type of material they propagate about the Jews, which mixes Judaism and Zionism as the evidence of the "threat", is an article by Novosti Press Agency of October 11, 1972. It contains a recital of atrocities about which it declares: "The history of mankind shows that criminal ideology inspires and stimulates criminal practise... This is the official ideology of the Zionist state, the 'sacred' books of Judaism which are studied by each child in Israeli schools for up to 1500 hours. According to its main concept, the world must belong to the followers of Yehve, the all-mighty God, for the sake of whom they can 'wear any guises'... When this people outnumber all other peoples, 'God will revolt as an aspect of their attack on the Soviet Union. From the recent Mark Gayn article already cited: "An untutored Pravda of the Communist party newspaper Pravda could almost visualize Israel as a major military power menacing this country (USSR) from across a shared border." Annihilating the likes of such a "threat" to humanity cannot, and maybe is not, too far off as a solution on the timetable of Soviet "anti-Zionism".

Is all of this consistent with their domestic policy toward Russian Jews? Their policy is clear: the only good Jew is an assimilated Jew. That policy was originated during the Stalinist era and continues unchanged. It calls for forced assimilation (reminiscent of medieval forced conversion) which began with the 1948-53 demolition of the remnants of the leadership of the Jewish community, through a systematic murder and terror. The Jews have never recovered.

Any desire or attempt to organize Jewishly; to study religious or national culture, the languages of Hebrew or Yiddish, are all stifled as a manifestation of "Zionist" menaces. To identify as a Jew other than as a stamp in one's passport is considered aggressors. The Soviets suddenly were screaming for UN intervention, rushing to rescue their equipment and clients from humiliating defeat, following Arab initiation of another attack. The ceasefire seems to be a tricky manoeuvre to save the Arab states from another defeat. It allows the Soviets to rearm and retrain the Arabs for another aggression, in a continuing struggle to annihilate the Israeli people.

They use the Arabs very well as part of their greater imperial ambitions. They have good partner-accomplices, since the Arab "anti-Zionism" is the same vicious anti-semitism the Soviets brought to them, to share the filth.

As mutually directed aims, the policy of the permanent ruling party, in Egypt's three-prong program, would satisfy any Soviet plan for Jewish destruction. First, it calls for the "Liquidation of the aggression" (i.e. Arab attacks until Israel is beaten totally?); second, "pushing Israel back to the partition boundaries"; third, "re-establishment of the attachment of every Jewish community to the mother country from which it has come." Carrying through such a program would be Hitlerian in its proportions. What would the Arab states do with three million "Zionists", whose "mother countries" won't want them? The program was published February 4, 1971, and called: "On the Nature of the Fourth War."

Soviet machinations and manipulations at the UN are exploiting current US weakness and the vacuum of morality in Europe. They have the advantage also of traditional world and UN apathy or hostility to Jews and the Jewish state. (Witness the astounding unconcern on the nuclear threat to Israel.)

The USSR must obviously not be trusted at all by Israel and Jews. Soviet imperialism and power playing are the clearest evidence for why their efforts are suspicious. Also Soviet "advisers" commanding and planning the attacks of annihilation from Syria; and aiding in preparations for the Egyptians (also getting Soviet training), are simply direct interventions. They are also glad to be able to test their weapon efficiency in combat situations.

It is significant to note specifically Soviet involvement to expose their responsibility for aggravating hostilities. The Soviets were aware of the attack's planning since they quietly evacuated their dependents. During the first stages of the aggression, Brezhnev called all other Arab states to join the war to make a decisive blow of annihilation against the Israelis "for the Palestinians".

Soviet support spurs further aggression. As well as all of these activities, they began to airlift intensively from their huge arsenal in the period preceding the war, obviously expecting a need to develop somehow. Following the war, it has been reported in the press, the Arabs have been totally rearmed to compensate for all their losses.

Perhaps the Arabs are the victims. They are the victims of irrational hatred for Israel, "Zionism", and Jews; and of the callousness of Soviet imperialism and organized anti-semitism. The Soviets are still willing to fight to the last Arab — to kill the last Jew.

Somehow, the echo of recent history is too strong to be ignored. Some will say it can't happen again; the Soviets are different; and one must try to avoid creating unwarranted suspicions and tension. The evidence of events and the historical facts are considered by such people as unrelated, not a sign of any purposive action. Some people are afraid of drawing such a conclusion until they themselves are threatened.

The pattern is the same: aggressive imperialism and racist anti-semitism; appeasement called delente, which the Soviets dispense with when it doesn't serve them; a belief the threat to the Jews is not so great and will disappear. The threat is too great and too blatant to be dispensed with by Jews and other people of good will. Israel must not be traded away to appease the Soviets.

If the Jews are to survive, the world must do all in its power, and we must do all in our power, to help resist a seemingly concerted program of anti-semitism hidden by the deceptive language of "anti-Zionism." What is faced is a potential violent nuclear genocide in Israel and an actual process of cultural genocide in the Soviet Union. Again, in the 20th century, six million Jews may be sacrificed.

Ken Green

give to it all for final extermination."

Its continued diatribe tells how Jews are supposed to kill, cheat, steal, lie, and do human sacrifice of non-Jews, etc., for the sake of their "ideology". Jews are responsible, through Zionism, for all the ills of the world and of history and especially for all the Soviet people's problems.

As Emanuel Litvinoff observes about the articles and the campaign: "Putting aside the updated terminology of zion-Zionism, the updated terminology of anti-Zionism, medieval anti-semitism which held Jews responsible for poisoning wells, spreading plague, and conducting ritual sacrifices of Christian innocents in obedience to the commands of an accursed religious creed."

The "Zionists" are also blamed for organizing and financing fascism and Nazism (the Nazis blamed them for communism and Bolshevism). The "Zionists" also worked with the Nazis to kill the six million Jews (a rather ingenious simultaneous homicide and suicide, apparently). They also manage British, French, and American imperialism. They also staged the Hungarian and Czechoslovakian and Polish workers'

"Zionist subversion". All the fighters for Jewish freedom in the Soviet Union are branded as "Zionists". The Emigration Movement is also an undeniable "Zionist plot". Even dissidence itself is allied to the "Zionist conspiracy". The two strands of internal and external "new" anti-semitism seem tightly linked.

(Refer: Between Hammer and Sickle, by Arie Ellav; The Jews of Silence, by Elie Wiesel.)

Is it possible the ruling group in the USSR is very insecure about something, perhaps their own power, to have latched upon the oldest scapegoat in their history? To justify their cultural genocide of the Russian Jews, they have conveniently discovered "anti-Zionism". From the Czars to the commissars they come full circle, and go toward deeper degeneration. The engineered Arab terrorist attack on Sakharov indicates a great fear of the Soviets of their people discovering the truth, any truth.

The current ceasefire is a predictable development. For ten days they stalled and vetoed any UN action until Israel was about to decisively attain victory against the

Estonian slams Toike

As if the ethnic slur against Italians in the last issue of TOIKE OIKE were not enough, the TINY TOIKE of November 12 concluded with yet another disgusting piece of irresponsible "journalism". On this occasion Estonians were subjected to abuse.

The Ukrainian Students' Club wishes to express in the strongest terms its indignation at this senseless and malicious use of ethnic stereotypes. We condemn this lowest form of slander.

Mykhajlo Hetmanчук, president

SDS replies to Toike letter

It is interesting that the editor of the Toike Oike, in seeking to defend his cartoon slandering Italians offers no apology but instead defends racism. While obviously knowing very little about it, he leaps to back up Ian Hector, the medical school prof who thinks that Italians are "culturally predisposed" to play a sick role and should therefore have their workmen's compensation payments cut off. The editor, through the use of hypothetical data tries to suggest that Hector bases his conclusions on scientific studies, which is most emphatically not true. We have searched the literature for the last 13 years, and there are no such studies as far as we can determine. Our point is that Hector's theory is not science, but racism.

Here is a quote from a consultant's opinion on a report Hector wrote about an Italian worker: "I regretfully conclude that I find a tone of hostility and prejudice toward the patient's nationality in Dr. Hector's report which seemed to result in punitive recommendations for disposition of the patient's claims that are not based upon psychiatric principles of treatment, but rather upon Dr. Hector's personal feelings about the patient's cultural origins..." (by M. Erik Wright, Ph.D., M.D., Director Clinical Psychology Programs, Professor, Departments of Psychology and Psychiatry, University of Kansas).

Also, many people who laughed off the "joke" about Italians as harmless wouldn't have found the mob that turned out in front of Simcoe Hall to defend it Wednesday very funny. The Toike editor said in his letter to The Varsity that it is not the "word" that offends but the "thought behind it." It became rather clear that the "thoughts" of perhaps 40 or 50 out of 250 were directed toward defending racism, not the right to tell jokes. When an SDS speaker mentioned Hitler's murder of the Jews as an example of where racism leads, one shouted "he shoulda got them all!" Others denied the right (or capacity) of Italians to get a decent job, and laughed when examples of racism at U of T were cited. Certainly this proves our point that this Toike "humor," while it does not oppress people in itself, reflects and reinforces racist attitudes and leads to more of the same.

Fortunately, this group turned out to be a minority. After the rally when the disrupters had left 60-70 people stayed for up to an hour to talk and debate various aspects of racism in the university and society. Some said they were interested in helping to fight it. This, of course, was our purpose. We are trying to build a movement against racism. If in the process there are a few confrontations with racists, so be it. They should know that people are very angry about it.

We should also be clear that we were not trying to confront all engineers. We don't believe in the "engineer-artsie" stereotypes. We were opposing the racism being pushed by the Toike and we think that many of the engineers who came to the rally saw how ugly its defenders became.

We might also note that racism is virtually nonexistent in the current issue of the Toike. Is this a coincidence?

What is featured is more revealing—a lengthy, confused and distorted diatribe against socialism, communism, The Varsity and everything left of the Chilean junta. Maybe this radical rightism of the John Birch-Western Guard variety is the true "thought behind the words." Certainly it is an ominous development, and one that engineers should be concerned about.

Finally, two points. Mario Tino of the Italian Club fully approved of the letter SDS and he jointly sent to The Varsity. Maybe you think he can't think for himself? Second, SDS has about 20 members. About 70-80 people have been involved in various SDS activities over the last year, more if you count those who came to our anti-racism teach-in. Fight Racism.

Faculty members support Ivey

The recent series of editorials and letters attacking Professor Ivey is almost bound to have consequences which are harmful to students and to the university as a whole. As colleagues who have known Professor Ivey for many years, we have witnessed his constant dedication to the interests of students, both in regard to their welfare, and to the quality of teaching to which they are subjected. This dedication can be (and has been) confirmed by his students, and the fact that he has been the recipient of international awards for his teaching efforts is proof that he applies to himself the standards he proclaims. Further, Professor Ivey has been articulate in expressing his views about teaching and university administration, views he has arrived at independently on the basis of experience and conviction. However one may agree or disagree with these views, one has to respect his readiness to voice and defend them.

It is damaging to see someone who has always placed such a high value on good teaching, on participating in the debates about university policy, and on maintaining close contacts with students, attacked so viciously. It will inevitably promote cynicism in some faculty members, and lead them to limit their contacts with students to those necessary to carry out their teaching function. It is difficult to believe that those who mount such attacks really have the interests of students at heart.

Red paint splatters Artistic picket clash

By TIM GALLAGHER

"Cease the illegal acts," police warned over a loudspeaker as about 250 pickets blocked cars of strikebreakers from entering the Artistic Woodwork plant Wednesday morning while hurling balloons filled with red paint.

The Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) has been on strike at two Artistic plants in North York since August 21st for basic union rights.

Following Monday's mass picket which led to 12 arrests and a number of injuries, the Ontario Labor Relations Board accepted the union's application to prosecute management for "failing to bargain in good faith."

Wednesday's picket was smaller but involved more industrial workers, some from the Ontario Federation of Labor's (OFL) convention in Toronto.

About 60 police had their hands full removing pickets from the plant's laneway as six cars of strikebreakers arrived in a cavalcade.

For awhile, the cars were stopped dead in their tracks. Balloons filled with red paint were hurled at the cars but most missed their mark, spraying pickets and police instead. Everything from stones to potatoes were thrown at cars while police grappled with pickets.

One picket was angry because he said the plant photographer stationed on a nearby roof "was throwing rocks at people" as they tried to block cars from entering the plant.

In retaliation a few pickets threw rocks back at the photographer and also through the plant's windows.

Police made 15 arrests raising the total arrested to more than 100. However, after the initial clash with pickets police returned to the picket line and after several scuffles made more arrests.

Pickets were upset at the new arrests and poured onto the road in a vain effort to prevent police vans from leaving with those arrested.

Just after the picket line regrouped people started surrounding two police photographers who were behind the picket line near the plant. People chanted "Out, out, out."

The police photographers retreated but one stumbled dropping his equipment.

Various unions were represented on the picket line including the United Steelworkers, Local 6500 (Sudbury) and Local 1005 (Hamilton).

In response to the OFL's reluctance to give official support to the strike, Cecil Taylor, Local 1005, remarked: "It is my opinion that the OFL won't do anything." A postal worker added: "Not enough people are concerned about the brutality going on here."

A CTCU spokesman summed up picket line feelings when he said: "We want peace on the picket line but the police prevented that."

Several pickets were "toughed up" said one union spokesman. In addition, the spokesman said people arrested that day reported that one person arrested was released from the police station with serious injuries. This same person had been unmarked before entering the station. Apparently the person was beaten by police.

Elephants get green light

By DICK BROWN

Students who feel like sheep being herded around from one place to another on campus should take heart.

An engineer for the city's public works department said Monday that students charge across Queen's Park Crescent "like a bunch of elephants going to class."

D.C. Doherty, director of the engineering and programs section, in a discussion of the proposed traffic light at Hoskin Avenue and Queen's Park, told the city-university liaison committee the student-elephants never use traffic lights even if they are installed.

Doherty said the Metro government "has movies taken of students not using lights" on Bloor Street which prompted Alderman Dan Heap to inquire if Metro is filming students from a blue van—a veiled reference to police activity during demonstrations and strikes.

The dog in the manger causing delays in approval is somewhere in Metro Council, as Archer explained. Metro transportation committee won't have a report on the light until January and then it must be passed Metro Council.

Innis College principal Peter Russell admitted he has often jaywalked across Queen's Park to get to lectures on time and he wondered if students would do the same thing even with a traffic light.

Rose Smith of the Huron-Sussex ratepayers suggested: "Let the elephants make their own plans (for a traffic light) since they are the ones most affected." Even the representatives from SAC missed picking up that plug for student parity.

Heap, however, suggested putting up a holdog stand at the corner of Hoskin and Queen's Park. "To lure the elephants to the corner" instead of a Russell-style jay-walk.

GAA union could be Canadian breakthrough

The Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) will be the first union of teaching assistants in Canada if it succeeds in obtaining recognition by the Ontario Labor Relations Board (OLRB), said Frank Miller, University of Windsor Graduate Students Society president, on Wednesday.

This would be an important historical precedent, he told a GAA organizational meeting.

Miller heads the only de facto university group in Canada which bargains on behalf of graduate students. Though the Windsor GISS is not a legal bargaining agent before the OLRB it has been recognized by the Senate and the Board of Governors of Windsor University.

Miller's main purpose in speaking at the Wednesday GAA meeting was to give the union's members specific ideas on how to achieve their goals. However, his speech turned into a pep talk.

He said that many eyes were turned on developments at the U of T. To give an idea of the magnitude and significance of the GAA's activities, Miller pointed out that the minimum number of members needed by the GAA (i.e., 700 members) for union recognition would exceed the number of regular faculty in many Canadian universities.

At the meeting, Andy Stanley, GAA full time organizer, said that GAA membership was nearing the 700 membership mark.

This number is the critical one for the union because once it is reached the GAA will have a sufficient number of members for recognition by the OLRB as the official union of graduate assistants at the U of T.

The union needs 35 per cent, of an estimated 2,000 teaching assistants at the U of T, or 700 members. Stanley however emphasized that the union was now aiming at an 800 member mark.

In his speech Miller gave a vivid description of the situation at Windsor before and after the GSS was recognized as the graduate assistants' bargaining agent.

Before official recognition of the GSS the situation at Windsor included: no uniform employment practices and procedures for the entire university, the disparity between teaching assistant (TA) salaries in various departments running as high as $1500; ranging from $500 to $200 favoritism in the assignment of teaching jobs to graduates; and job termination without notice.

After the GSS became the recognized bargaining agent for the graduates the situation changed radically. Working conditions and salaries were standardized. All TAs received $2400 for 10 hours work per week over two terms.

Graduates were included in a committee which established teaching load guidelines and assigned TA jobs to individual students. Further, all decisions of the committee were made binding.

Perhaps the most important result of the recognition of the GSS by the faculty, senate and Board of Governors of Windsor University, Miller said, was the general improvement of the mental atmosphere on the campus.

The growing isolation of the graduate students from each other and from the regular teaching staff was reversed.

In view of the events at Windsor Miller felt that similar things could happen at the U of T. He suggested that the GAA's primary task should be to reduce the disparity between TA salaries in different departments within the U of T. This could best be done by establishing a uniform wage structure and grievance procedure.

Miller believed the union's primary goal should be to ensure that all TA's get a fair deal. If this were achieved the entire university community would be the main beneficiary.

Snilda's opens up

Students at St. Hilda's, the women's residence at Trinity College, voted yesterday to allow all-night male visitors.

All but a handful of residents voted as open visiting hours were approved 80 to 35.

St. Hilda's is the third women's residence at the university to approve unrestricted visiting hours. This policy is also in effect at both of Victoria College's women's residences, Margaret Addison Hall and Annesley Hall.

At New College, the women's residence, Wetmore Hall, allows all night male guests on weekends, but sets a deadline of 1 am from Monday to Thursday.

Women at the two St. Michael's College residences have the most restrictive visitor's policy. St. Joseph's residence allows male visitors on Saturday and Sunday afternoons. Loretto College allows male guests only on Sunday afternoons.

St. Michael's is the only college on campus whose men's residences do not have wide-open visitors' hours.

Women guests are forbidden on week-days at the men's residences of St. Michael's College. They are allowed until 1:30 am Friday and Saturday and between 12 and 7 pm on Sunday.

PARKING PROPOSALS

The Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council invites comments on the following proposals which are to be discussed at its meeting on December 3rd. Further information about the proposals may be obtained from the Office of the Vice-President, Internal Affairs, to whom written comments should be sent before November 23rd.

1. The overall aim is to restrict all-day parking on the campus (as recommended by the City of Toronto's Commissioner of Works).
2. The number of parking spaces should be maintained at approximately 2,000, which represents a reduction of 300 spaces in the present inventory due to the proposed construction of Innis College and the Athletic Complex on sites presently being used for parking.
3. Parking spaces should be allocated on the basis of need; i.e. distance or travelling time from the University; vehicle required as part of job during day; physical infirmity.
4. Those qualifying under 3. would receive permits and would pay a reasonable charge. Any spaces left over would be available on a strict hourly cash basis to other members of the University community.
5. Scattered parking lots should be replaced as soon as possible by parking structures, the cost of which would be amortized by the users.
6. A gradual policy of increasing the rates and decreasing the number of parking spaces should be instituted to prepare members of the University for the time when parking spaces will be expensive and scarce.

An incredulous Budapest Symphony plays to an empty hall

The two concerts given by the Budapest Symphony Orchestra last Thursday and Friday must have been the best kept secret of the year. Advertising was minimal, mostly confined to ethnic bakeries and barbers, the hall was booked at the last minute (acoustically cavernous Convoction Hall) and ticket agencies were absolutely ignorant of place, time and programme. It turned out that manager Sol Hurok (who took the Canadian Ballet for everything they had last year) was perpetrating this comedy of errors through a Canadian representative, who in the meanwhile went bankrupt.

Thus it was that the Budapest Symphony Orchestra, probably the best of Budapest's five (!) full symphonic orchestras, arrived after two weeks of sold-out performances and acclamation in major American cities to play to a handful of loyal Hungarians at our Convoction Hall. Even at the second concert, the musicians were incredulous. Conductor Gyorgy Lehel shook his head: "I can't convey to you the utter shock of arriving after rave reviews and full houses in Chicago and walking on stage to conduct a 100 piece orchestra for an audience of 50."

Those who went were offered an excellent alternative to our resident symphony. The programme of Debussy, Tchaikowsky, Szöllösy and Hindemith gave ample evidence of that big European string sound which is lacking around here. The first of two Debussy Nocturnes ("Nuages") was full and lush but with a subtlety of dynamics that comes of complete confidence and ability. I especially enjoyed the soft range of the string section which was always persuasive and never fuzzy. The second Nocturne ("Fêtes"); the third, "Sirènes", requires a choir, and was omitted) was a little too deliberate, and the winds lacked the sparkle of the better American orchestras. There was a tendency to constant vibrato among the woodwinds which overly softened the incisiveness of their attack.

Violinist Andras Kiss gave a fine performance of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto. Kiss has no equivalent in this country for he represents a young virtuoso at the threshold of an international career. It is to the credit of the cultural policy of Hungary that they regularly offer such opportunities to allow young soloists to become known in the best of contexts.

Kiss played with consummate ease, and there was never any hint of the technical difficulties that this work poses. His slow movement was lyrical and faster movements sparked with excitement. While he has not yet developed the grand overview which comes with maturity, he was also refreshingly honest in interpretation, and free of the idiosyncrasies of older players. His phrasing was polished and his crystalline articulation spoke clearly even in the grandest of tuttis, which the orchestra played with all the boldness of the Pathétique symphony.

The contemporary work, a sine qua non of any concert nowadays, was Music per Orchestra by Szöllösy. The work is an interesting treatment of tone clusters and instrument clusters in quasi-tonal progressions. The clusters are treated individually and in an overlapping fashion with horizontal sheets of tone textures arising from different areas. There is a pseudo-passacaglia from the middle part of the work, with the contrabassoon providing a ground bass. There are elements in this work similar to Penderecki and especially to Ligeti, with long shimmering tones that change subtly, element by element. The work however is too long and, as my companion remarked, it is unlike Ligeti in that it does not generate an internal compulsion to justify its length.

The evening closed with Hindemith's Mathis der Maler, the composer's tribute to Mathias Grunewald the master painter. This is difficult music which was a pleasure to hear in such fine performance. The orchestra has none of the daredevil excitement of local orchestras, perhaps because nothing is left to luck. It does generate a deep internal fire which throws fewer sparks but illuminates every line. The opening of the third movement with the combined string chorus grew with a strength and transparency that was quite breathtaking.

Smallwood as premier, liked to play with marbles. Unfortunately they belonged to other people.

Joey Smallwood is the little boy who never grew up. Oh, his body may have aged a bit: if he has far too much energy and enthusiasm for a man of 73, he at least looks like he's into his second half century.

But deep down inside, where it counts, Joey is still the small Newfoundland boy that he was in the years before the First World War, when he was growing up in the impoverished island colony. As an adolescent, a young man, or an influential politician, Joey retained the same insatiable curiosity and energy, the naive enthusiasm, the artless boastfulness, with which he plagued relatives and teachers as a pesky, utterly irrepressible youngster.

It's only when you understand that that you can begin to comprehend Joey's garrulous autobiography, I Chose Canada.

How else to explain the long lists he gives at the beginning of the book, naming all the famous people that were alive when he was born, all the wars and revolutions that were going on? Or the lengthy list he provides as an appendix, of all the famous people he met during his lifetime? The chapters on relations and people bearing the family name who may not even have been related, who "made good"? The constant tendency to write, even of the days when he was little more than an indigent eccentric, as if the entire world revolved around him?

To call him arrogant is really to miss the point. Joey is a man without airs, utterly un-self-conscious, at home in a fisherman's cottage or in Buckingham Palace. He's simply completely self-confident, a man who we may be sure has never in his entire life had a moment of self-doubt. His is the simple glowing pride, not in the least pompous, of the little go-getter who has just won all the other kids' marbles.

There is so little sense of proportion, however, in his tale, such a boundless need to recount every little triumph (as well as the temporary defeats that, naturally, merely paved the way for greater victories), that it becomes tedious. You keep on reading through the entire 600-pages torrent as much out of incredulity that it never stops as out of interest.

There's much that's interesting, of course, in the life of the little premier. His career as a gee-whiz cub reporter in St. John's (Joey makes Jimmy Olson look like Walter Lippmann), his days as a soap-box socialist in the U.S., his fame as a colourful radio commentator, his venture into the business world as a pig farmer as well as the campaign to bring Newfoundland into Confederation — all make a fine tale, though perhaps better told with a few bottles of scotch going round than in cold print.

What is striking though, is how the style changes when Joey comes to his years in power. Suddenly the stream of anecdotes starts to dry up. Generalities, philosophizing, defensive statements, replace the earlier earthy common sense. It's obvious that there is much that is being hidden, rationalized, or questionably interpreted.

And if you examine the historical record, you'll find that that's the case. He recounts his achievements, but barely mentions his failures. Criticism is ignored, or referred to in passing and dismissed.

He vigorously defends his smashing of the Newfoundland loggers' strike, for example, which appalled much of Newfoundland and Canada, including even Prime Minister John Diefenbaker, rarely accused of being a friend of labour, and seems to imply that opposition to him was due to ignorance, political opportunism or plain perversity.

From a historical point of view, the most interesting part of the book is the treatment of the question of economic development. As premier, Joey dervished around the world, seeking investment capital, and offering astounding concessions.

One of the most famous incidents arising from his peregrinations concerned his financial "wizard" adviser, Vladmanis, who, it eventually turned out, had been busily re-routing considerable sums of "investment capital" into his own pockets.

Somewhat less spectacular, but persistent, were the repeated charges, which eventually contributed materially to Joey's downfall, that he was being hood-winked and fleeced by the international sharpsters he was doing business with, and that Newfoundland was suffering the consequences. "I feel as if I'm married to Newfoundland," Joey said during one of his last campaigns. "You should," shouted a heckler, "you've been screwing her long enough".

He defends himself by arguing that it was imperative to bring industry and jobs to Newfoundland by any means, and that he had to give significant concessions to make the deals attractive. "I had to deal with rich capitalists" he said (Joey still considers himself socialist), "the poor don't have any money to invest". The overall results, he claimed, were beneficial for Newfoundland.

His opponents disagree, arguing that Newfoundland, still far and away Canada's poorest province, gave away huge amounts for paltry returns.

In this context, it's interesting to note that when Joey campaigned for Confederation, he repeatedly flailed Newfoundland's "twenty millionaires". Yet one of his later boasts was that there were many more millionaires in the Newfoundland of his premiership. One tends to conclude that a lot of the profits from Newfoundland's newly acquired industry have gone into a very few pockets.

Although in Joey's latter years in the premiership it was said that there were two views of his economic policies, the more charitable of which was that he was simple-minded and gullible, nevertheless, it is pointless to blame him for Newfoundland's economic failures. Given the circumstances, he had little choice. (Though there is little doubt he made money through his political connections.)

The pattern of capitalist industrial development has always been to produce concentrated poles of development, and large areas of underdevelopment. Capital (contrary to accepted economic dogma) is constantly sucked from the periphery to the centre, as is labour. The result is that underdevelopment is perpetuated, and gaps widened. The only way to fight the process under capitalism has been Joey's way (Castro's is the other) — to offer really attractive inducements to private capital. The trouble is — especially in Canada, where corporations habitually play off competing provinces against each other for the best concessions — that after the corporations' terms are met, there are a few jobs, but little tax revenue and even less capital available for reinvestment in other sectors to stimulate real economic development. So the gap still doesn't close.

A less gullible premier than Joey might have had less fiascos, but it is very doubtful indeed that he would have had more success.

Joey, admittedly, is not the type of man to lead anyone out of the wilderness. Not quite a piper, he is nonetheless far from being the Moses he makes himself out to be. But he was — and he's far from dead yet — a colourful and human figure in our public life. For that, we owe him some affection.

Smallwood as a (self-created) national myth.

audio emporium, then you're halfway there. But what if you don't? The first thing to figure out is what kind of music you listen to most often. It may surprise you to learn that some speakers are well suited to classical, but are nearly total failure when it comes to handling heavy-metal rock music. As well, some speakers punch out fine sounds for rock, but sound boxed-in for the more intimate sounds of chamber music or folk.

(As a general guide, those speakers made on the US East coast (such as AR and Dynaco) have the low efficiency and wide range best suited for the classics, and the ones from California have the "bite" or "presence" in the mid-range, which along with blisteringly high efficiency give rock its characteristic sound. The speakers typically used at outdoor concerts or festivals are PA versions of the California jobs.)

While we're on the question of speakers, it's worth repeating the old chestnut that the speaker is by far the most personal element of all the hi-fi components, and there are more variations in the way any two given speakers will sound with the same type of music than you would find in 100 amplifiers. Simply, if one type of speaker doesn't suit you, there's a good chance that another one will. But again, the question comes up: "I'm not an expert. How do I go about choosing what to buy?"

The first thing to do is to arm yourself with copies of High Fidelity, Stereo Review, Gramophone, and as many back numbers of Consumer Reports as you can get that discuss hi-fi products. Then, read their reviews of new products. Nice and confused? Well, you should be. Equipment reviews are the most confusing things to try to glean any sense from. Half the time they read like the reviewer was taken out to a 10-course lunch by the manufacturer immediately before he got the product to take over to the testing lab. I'm not trying to say that there's outright plugging going on; it's just that the endless rhapsodizing over every new piece equipment that comes out begins to make one very suspicious. The American magazines High Fidelity and Stereo Review in particular have a great affinity for the phrase: "To our knowledge, this is the best speaker (tuner, amplifier, etc.) to date that we have tested." And this may well be the case, but since this crops up with discouraging regularity month after month, it doesn't do much for their credibility. Gramophone, a British publication (which is available in the reading room of the Robot Library) is far more objective, often going right into the manufacturer's factory as part of the research for the review. The only unfortunate part of this is that much of the equipment they discuss is simply not available in North America, and that which is, is usually horrendously expensive (B&O, Braun, and so on.)

Back to our bewildered buyer. The point I'm getting at in the question of equipment reviews is that if you read a report on a new receiver, for instance, and then go to hear it in the store, you'll find it damned hard to hear much difference between it and a product in the same price range. Even if the specifications are wildly divergent between two products (and I'll get to the whole thorny problem of specs in a moment), it can still be a baffling experience trying to hear why one set got the critic's raves and another didn't.

The most important question has yet to be answered: what to do in the store? Undoubtedly, you have a record that you know intimately, one that you've listened to so often that you know every squeak of the strings or cough in the audience. If you don't have a fresh, relatively undamaged copy of it (a console or record player with heavy stylus pressure can chew up a disc in just a few playings) invest in a new copy and trek over to the nearest hi-fi store. Close your eyes. Listen.

I wish it were possible to put on a blindfold when auditioning new equipment. It's so easy to be seduced by the dazzling array of controls, dial lights and gee-gaws so prevalent in today's equipment design that the sound often comes in a poor second in the consideration of the neophyte (or even the "expert"). So take my advice and listen to the music you know so well. Switch the sound from speaker to speaker, trying to see which one pleases you the most. Actually, the more records you can audition in this way, the better.

breezes up from behind you and announces his preference with that time-honoured formula: "Good afternoon, can I help you?" (In the less auspicious shops this is often abbreviated to "Whatcha want, kid?" or "Getcher hands off— ya buying?") It's easy enough to say "No thanks, just looking", and send the guy away to lick his wounds— but what if you really would like to hear a certain set? In most stores, touching without permission is highly frowned upon, due to the alarming rates of thefts.

So you proceed to ask the salesman if he'll turn on that receiver and show you the system. Fine. Out comes your favourite record, and the needle hits the groove. By bringing in a record, the salesman has you marked as a "serious" buyer, and this usually means a sale to him. There are advantages to appearing serious: you do get better treatment, and more of the salesman's time and attention. Often this can work in your favour, with a good salesman showing you everything in the store. On the other end of the scale, you may be stuck with an eager beaver who will show you one system and try to rip the cash out of your pocket before you've had a chance to really hear it.

Money is the most important consideration in the minds of audiophiles, so get to know the price classes of the various products. It's not necessary to know the price of every item in the field, and in fact this useless bit of trivia is not worth the trouble it takes to learn. What is important is the TEN years ago, hi-fi equipment was the exclusive province of the experimenter—the true "audiophile" who would often assemble his own gear and certainly was one of the most keen observers of the technological scene. The rest of us were exulting in tinny sound from the first transistor radios, or listening to "consoles", king-sized hunks of wood which held a pitiful assortment of speakers and electronics.

Today, the picture is as different as can be imagined, as even the briefest of looks around a hi-fi shop will tell you. Another thing that brief look will tell you, though, is that there is an absolutely mind-boggling collection of equipment available on today's market. What's more, in Toronto there are so many well-stocked stores that almost any item on the market can be seen and heard. It's hard to realize the contrast involved here unless you've lived in town or community where there are only two or three dealers, who stock only a very limited range.

There are plenty of good technical manuals on the market which detail the essential fundamentals of hi-fi electronics, and I won't try to go over all that in this article. What I am going to talk about is the part of hi-fi that the magazines and technical books can't or won't discuss—the hard facts of buying the stuff: how to buy, where to buy, and how to avoid getting ripped off.

Part One: Excuse me, but how do you turn this thing on?

If you've got a good idea of what you're looking for when you walk into the local

The Audio C "Step right but don't too many c

And now come to an issue which is a little more contentious...

Part Two: Have I got a deal for you

Once you walk into a store, you're fair game; the salesman stakes you out, and depending on the atmosphere of the place, puts the pressure on you to buy. Make no mistake about it, even if the shop gives the appearance of being the friend of the audio fan and not the home of the fast buck, the man showing you the gear has to make a living, and he can only make it one way—by selling.

Not all the dealers are crooks; in fact, very few are. There are certain tricks of the trade, though, and perhaps, speaking as a former hi-fi salesman I can elucidate some of them for you. When you walk in the door, it won't be long until a salesman price class of a given piece of equipment. If you have only $300 to spend on the whole system, find out what that will realistically buy. If you're lucky enough to have a thousand or two to blow, then make sure you know what every item is giving you for the money. I can't stress this enough.

Even if you're in the bargain basement check out the top-of-the-line sets. If you're going to get your money's worth it is absolutely essential to know what your dollar will buy. In a sentence, $349.95 will simply not get you a system containing turntable, cartridge, receiver, speakers, headphones and cassette deck with any quality at all. Such units are available, and they are unmitigated junk. Listen to speakers that cost $1000 per, headphones that go for $200, a receiver that would set you back $800 or so. This is hi-fi.

Then go and listen to what you can afford. (If you can afford the Rolls-Royce stuff, then read no further) It's bound to be a disheartening experience, because there's no way that a $500 receiver-turntable-and-speaker setup can give you the floor-shaking realism of a $4000 system that has everything from a hair-splittingly accurate cartridge to a display oscilloscope in it. What is the point of all this deliberate self-inflicted disappointment, then? It's an object lesson in hi-fi conservatism. The worst thing you can do in a hi-fi store is to get your expectations raised, either by an unethical salesman or your own inexperience to the point where you're considering a piece of third-rate gear that either looks fancy or seems to give you some of the features that a big outfit can, for a fraction of the cost.

You get what you pay for. This message ought to be inscribed by government order on every piece of equipment sold. What are the ways a receiver, for example to is being "technically augmented" in any way. The control marked "loudness", for example, will make any set of speakers sound more full, heavier in the bass. This control is designed for use at low volume levels, where our ear falls off in sensitivity around the bass end of the musical spectrum. At low volume levels, the loudness control boosts the bass notes to a point where they are audible, and the sound doesn't appear to be "half missing". When you're auditioning, though, leave this control off, as well as the tone controls (treble and bass) in the centered, "flat" position. This insures that what you're hearing through the system is the unaltered sound from the record.

In technical terms, this is called flatness, cha... (puts on record)...well listen ta thist (loud sound pours out, very "big" in presence and tone)

Customer: Gee, that's fabulous, uh... tell me more about it.

S.: Well, this receiver has got 300 watts, a distortion of only .01%, and more features than I could mention. Just take a look at this spec sheet, eh? (hands customer sheet)

C.: Well, I'm no expert. What does this mean?

What does this mean, indeed? Selling the customer a sheet of numbers instead of a music reproduction system is a rotten trick, but it moves a lot of equipment, and falls under the general category of bamboozling the consumer. Remember, O buyer, that's not a spec sheet that's going to live with you for the next few years, that's a pile of electronic equipment designed to reproduce music. If you don't seem too impressed in the store, stop! No specification sheet will make you like it any more. If the sheet tells you it's got 300 watts, can you figure out what that means? There are many different ways of measuring power, but only a few are accurate. Many claims made in advertising inflate true power output by as much as 200 percent, and since it's your hard-earned dough at stake, it's up to you to find out just what the numbers mean. Recent issues of Stereo Review have had an "Audio Glossary" in every issue. Check over at the curse of St. George for back copies, or subscribe. Consumers Reports also features this kind of information regularly.

Again, it's utterly important to look at the position of the tone controls. Make doubly sure the salesman (possibly inadvertently) has not set the controls to a position where they mask the true sound.

This covers nearly all the important aspects except the big one—money. Earlier I mentioned looking at expensive gear as a means of learning the true value of the hi-fi dollar. Once you've learned just what your money will buy, it's time to start shopping.

But what if the salesman tries to hustle you on a brand you're not familiar with. If you've done your homework, then you'll be familiar with most brands. But, outside of the chance that you really have missed something, beware of the brand you've never heard of. Some stores import their own equipment, and give the salesman a cash bonus for selling it, called "push money" or a "split", as an alternative to the usually low commission paid on most articles sold. This produces a salesman who has a great incentive to deal in the store's house brand, and this can result in a lot of junk going out the door. Watch out for those under-$400 systems that give you "everything". They usually fall into this category.

There are many outlets who will go far below list price; some will not budge. If every cent counts, then head for the discount. Make sure, though, that he will back up the product with service. If it's a service you want ask the salesman if he will refund your money or exchange the merchandise if you're not satisfied. And get this in writing. More than one shopper has tried to return an outright lemon to the dealer only to find that the salesman would have nothing to do with him. Get all claims referring to service in writing. One store offers a "service contract", which is quite a good idea; it specifies what the store will do for the customer in plain English. Interestingly enough, that store has a policy of "no cash refunds".

Interested in dealing on your own? If you've a little of the entrepreneurial spirit, you can save as much as 60% over high Toronto prices. In the back of the audio magazines dealers advertise: "Lowest Prices Anywhere" or some such thing. And these prices are incredibly low. The Dynaco A-25 speaker, for example, sells for $99 here, $51 at the discounts. Of course, they're all in the U.S., and they're all mail-order.

But if you don't mind a wait for what you order, and you're prepared to pay the 28.8% tax the feds will hit you for on the gear, you can get most or all of the brands you want for prices that make Canada look like inflation central. Another example: The ADC XLM cartridge, one of the finest on the market, costs $74.95 here, and that's likely to be the price you'd pay for it. The US list is $49.95, and one discount house (Midwest Hi-Fi, in Chicago) sold me one for $27.00. Shipping was a dollar, and duty amounted to five. So, for $33.00 and a month's wait, I got a fine cartridge at a huge saving. Everything from tuners to tape decks is sold at the discounts, and the savings on bulk tape are astounding. Anyone who goes through a lot of open-reel stock or cassette is advised to look into the mail-order houses.

A system that could cost you $1500 plus 7% for King William here could be had for about $750 plus shipping and duty, and is well worth it if you are willing to wait. Delays and out-of-stock situation seem to be frequent and there is one major drawback—warranty. Some, but not all manufacturers will honour the warranties of sets sold in America but serviced in Canada. Any company that does not distribute its own material in this country, and is marketed by an independent, such as Pioneer, will not service U.S. bought equipment for free. Watch it. Those are the risks you run.

david besakin

Game: up, sonny, n't ask questions" can cut corners to look like expensive gear? Firstly, fashions in front-panel design are as fast-changing and imitative as the clothing industry. If rocker switches come into vogue in the high-priced lines, it won't be long before the schlock merchants put them on their gear. It isn't uncommon in many second-rate factories to have the design team take precedence over the engineering group in the creation of a new product. This means that the technicians have to cope with an often unwieldy design for the wiring, switches and control imparted by a designer who knows that blackout dial lights are simply it this year.

The top-named makers (not necessarily the most expensive ones) rarely follow this practice. Acoustic Research, one of the most respected and possibly the most conservative companies, has refused even to put a dial light on their receiver, claiming this is unnecessary.

When you are auditioning a new piece of equipment it's essential to look at the controls to see if the music you're listening or linearity. Roughly speaking, the more you pay for a system, the closer to the ideal "clean" sound the rig will produce. Another aspect of Audio Conservatism is the adherence to linear, realistic sound as an ideal. What good is a system that spreads a solo guitar across fifteen feet of wall? Or one that makes a symphony orchestra sound like a chamber group?

Part Three: Dirty tricks and other adventures of the marketplace

By any account, the cheapest shot in the salesman's lexicon of "techniques" is the following: Scene: store. Characters: sharp salesman, confused customer.

Salesman: So you're interested in the Sharmantz 1620, eh? Ye gotta record wit-

Conspiracy should stick to the parlour

The Perth County Conspiracy are musical physiotherapists who spin out soft-rock hymns to the land and the people who till it. Once a year or so, they rent Massey Hall themselves (the Conspiracy doesn't use promoters) and put on a concert — to recharge the pastoral fantasies of jaded urban youth. Once a year or so rolled around last Sunday.

Politically, the group (with membership anywhere from three to infinity — give or take a few whole whole-wheat groupies swaying in the background) are kosher left-wing. They support the Kraft boycott, the grape boycott, Canadian nationalism and dirt farming. Sunday they quoted poetry from militant nationalist Milton Acorn, referred to communist hero Norman Bethune (applause) and mentioned North Bay (more applause). Members of the Conspiracy live on a rural commune near Stratford, play music for its own sake rather than profit and eschew ambition.

Very worthy stuff. The music's OK too. Although the tunes sound somewhat all the same, they're easy-going and usually well-executed.

At the same time, their concert Sunday was disappointing. One of the virtues of a Perth County concert is supposed to be its unconcern — no audience and performers, just one group of friends playing for another, as if in someone's living room. Sunday I could never quite forget I was in the second balcony of Massey Hall (and the second balcony, with everyone's knees pressing into the head of the person in front, is not like anyone's living room).

Most of the problem was acoustic. If you could hear, you could forget all those knees. But Perth County seemed to be conspiring to be inaudible (a concert of mainly lyrical ballads where you can't hear the lyrics lacks a certain something). One exception was vocalist Cedric Smith, who in his few appearances during the three-hour show, spoke and sang with the delivery of a Shakespearean actor.

In the main though, the group's attitude seemed to be that what the audience couldn't hear was their problem. For instance: an unidentified vocalist (from the second balcony you can't make out faces very well either) is mumbling some announcement. "Speak up, we can't hear," yells a fan from the first balcony (she can't hear! I didn't even know anyone was talking). "We're right here," says the mumbler, and keeps on mumbling. In other words: "Come a little closer if you can't hear us; we're not performers, just friends playing in someone's living room. It's your uplight dualistic view of audience and performer that makes you want us to drop our natural easy-going mumble and play to the crowd. And since we eschew ambition, we don't do that."

Fine. Except that in Massey Hall, unlike most people's living rooms, to get closer you have to climb down two sets of stairs, manoeuvre past a couple of security guards and squat in the aisle. Easygoingness is great until you shell out $2 or $2.50 not to hear it.

Perhaps the moral of the tale is that soft-spoken friends shouldn't play for other friends in straight-backed places like Massey Hall. Of course Perth County is in a bind. I imagine they feel particularly forced to play in large halls these days to help plug their fourth record Freaked-out peaceniks showered their idols with flowers and whole wheat bread.

(Rumours II). The group has dropped their former distributor, Columbia Records, rather than let that huge multi-national soak up corporate profits from their anti-corporate songs. The split denies Perth County the services of the reams of public relations people employed by the recording giants, forcing the group to rely more on mass appearances like Sunday's to hawk their album.

The split with Columbia also means that Perth County is able list their record at $3 rather than the normal $4 to $5 which says something about the benefits to consumers from large corporations.

Perth County's boycott of Columbia is like the boycott of Kraft Foods that the group supports. Both are attempts to buck the power of the big conglomerates and reintroduce a kind of Jeffersonian world of independent individual producers.

Like the Kraft boycott, it's a valiant attempt, and one can only wish them well. Besides, hearing Perth County on vinyl is a real living room is probably more satisfactory than not hearing them in Massey Hall.

Reggae and revolt in seething Kingston

The Harder They Come does not simply tell a story — the rise and fall of one singer, Ivan — it tries to capture a ferment of creativity such as occasionally happens when large groups of people who have been more or less forced to move, converge on one center. In this case, the poor of Jamaica's inland have been flocking to the slums of Kingston, and they have produced reggae.

The only comparable situations I can think of are Chicago's South Side in the 1920's, and Harlem in the 1930's. In all three cases, those who migrated had a definite culture to begin with — it seems to have needed only the catalyst of the move to flower.

Like Harlem and Chicago, almost no one is "outside" the culture — the only exceptions are those who ape the prevailing white life-style, and the tourists. But everyone else can be seen to be a part — the members of the Ras Tafari sect, the African Evangelical congregations and their preachers, even the police, with their intricate coexistence with those they are supposed to control. An obvious attempt has been made to include everybody, down to getting a variety of reggae styles on the soundtrack. By comparison, Alan Price does a half-hearted job on O Lucky Man!

Ivan, played by Jimmy Cliff, who is one of the two most popular reggae singers (along with Desmond Dekker), is a natural outlaw whose models are derived from Westerners seen in the local cinemas. He adapts North American popular culture to serve his own ends by stealing a convertible and invading a country club, driving around on the golf course, rounding the 14th hole, laughing at the world. His motto is: "I am here but I disappear."

Occasionally, the acting is wooden, and there are a few jarring elements in the script, as when Ivan's girlfriend tells him quite seriously "Ivan, you're a dreamer," a line more fitting for Hollywood in the '40's. Sometimes the plot transitions are clumsy, particularly when the scene shifts from Kingston to the ganga (hashish) fields in the second half. A local "mover" whom Ivan has met asks him if he is interested in making some real money, and he goes. In this way, the movie spills into almost unconnected halves.

One final note: This is the only movie I have seen where subtitles were necessary to put across dialogue in English for English-speaking audiences.

Brahms sonatas are lovely stuff, even for the masses

Brahms: Two Violin Sonatas, op. 100, No. 2
Isaac Stern, violin, Alexander Zakin, piano
Columbia

A music teacher of mine once told me, "Brahms isn't for the masses — it's intellectual music". It was a long time before I understood that remark, and even now I'm not sure I'd agree. I don't think it really matters whether his music is for the wide audience of a Vivaldi or a Verdi, but it really hits it on the head to call the music intellectual. If you approach this music expecting to have a story told, or passion thrown at your feet, you'll be disappointed, for Johannes Brahms was one of the most introspective and self-critical of all composers.

He was a throwback, in a sense. In a time when the world worshipped the ultra-romantic world of Richard Wagner, he harkened back to the days of Mozart and even Bach, pursuing a neo-classicism all his own. The Vienna of that time was divided in two by the composer's styles with fights in the cafes not unknown in the bitter disputes that surrounded the music. One tavern even went so far as putting up a sign over the door saying: "There will be no talk of either Brahms or Wagner in here!" The dispute went far deeper than one of musical taste — in no small way it was a conflict of life-styles. Now that history has had a say, both men are respected, with some odd record couplings occasionally placing them on opposite sides of a piece of vinyl.

Isaac Stern, America's premier violinist, knows all this history well, and knows that you can't approach Brahms flippantly or without thinking out the performance well in advance. It's not that the music is dry or emotionless, and needs the efforts of a supremely gifted interpreter to get any sort of worth out of it. In fact, there's emotion and melody to spare in these sonatas. But Stern never gives a halfway performance, and his accompanist, Alexander Zakin is always in accord with the violinist's wishes. The Op. 100 sonata was written for the famous Joseph Joachim in 1886. It sings with warmth and amiability, possibly because the composer wrote it to patch up his friendship with the violinist, which had suffered when Brahms took the side of Joachim's wife when they split up.

There's little to criticize in Stern's performance of this work; it's obviously one he's been playing for a long time, because every note and inflection seems purposeful and logical. He's simply in tune with Brahms's intentions. Also worth mentioning is the piano playing of Zakin. Brahms was an absolutely formidable player, one of the greatest of his era, and he wrote all his pieces with himself in mind. (To this day his B-flat concerto remains one of the most difficult in the repertoire). A Brahms sonata for solo piano or any combination of piano-and-soloist never puts the piano in a subsidiary role; the music is always a dialogue between the soloist and the "accompanist", which isn't really the right term for the pianist in a Brahms sonata — "co-soloist" isn't even too far-fetched a description.

The Op. 120 sonata is another case altogether. The work is known far better as a sonata for Clarinet and Piano, originally written for Richard Mühlfeld. He was both a clarinetist and a violinist, but the work has been performed largely by clarinetists since it was written. This was my first encounter with it as a violin sonata, having played it myself in my clarinet days, and I'm not sure that it works as well in this arrangement, transcribed by Brahms himself.

Stern and Zakin give it an expert reading, but somehow I miss the swoop and glowing tone that the clarinet gives the music. Still, it's the only available recording of the arrangement, and Stern presents its case very well indeed. If chamber music like this is terra incognita for you, it's not a bad place to start. Brahms is just the kind of stuff to sink your teeth into.

Also worth hearing if you're new to the Brahms game is his B minor quintet for clarinet and strings, (given a lyrical and crystal-clear performance by Karl Leinster and the Amadeus Quartet on DG 139354) or the Variations on a theme of Paganini (there are many excellent recordings of the variations; my favourite is by Earl Wild on Vanguard c-10006).

Lovely stuff. Even if you are one of the masses.

suggest the range of which Bloomfield is capable. His trademarks are frequent time-changes, highly-imaginative solos which always sound so loosely-constructed that they are about to fall apart, yet manage not to, B.B. King to the nth power, some Indian influence, and a strong blues background. Perhaps jazz-blues-rock is a better description.

Bloomfield's name, although he has played on a number of the best albums in rock history, is strangely little-known to the general public. In part, this is due to his love of playing for the sake of playing. Stardom doesn't interest him. Although with his present group, which includes Mark Naftalin on piano, Roger 'Jellyroll' Troy on bass and lead vocals, and a drummer who keeps pretty much in the background, Bloomfield sounds as good as he has since his days with The Paul Butterfield Blues Band, he has no present plans to record with them.

In one way, it was good on Sunday night that Bloomfield is not one of rock's Stars. The performance was completely natural, the first few bars of 'Good Morning Little Schoolgirl' being out of time. After the official end, Bloomfield fooled around on piano, Naftalin improvising around him on drums. On the other hand, the crowd, at least for the second show, was disappointingly thin.

Naftalin, a first-rate pianist, has been associated with Bloomfield for years, since the days of the old Butterfield Blues Band. Unfortunately he can't sing, as was shown in a speeded-up version of an old song (from about 1950), 'Wolverton Mountain' (one of the few unnecessary moments in the concert). For the last three numbers, Bloomfield joined Naftalin on organ. Evidently piano was Bloomfield's original instrument, and he wishes he had the chance to play keyboards more often.

Roger Troy is likewise an old friend, a one-time member of the Hollywood Argyles ('Alley Oop'), with a vocal style not unlike that of David Clayton Thomas, all the way from pathos to bathos. 'I'm gonna drown in my own tears!', laments Rogers. I second the emotion. Oh yes!

Note: Bloomfield played 1959 Les Paul Sunburst, touted as 'the Absolute—the greatest—guitar ever.' (For those of you who thought he was playing a guitar, in your inattention.)

In contrast to Bloomfield's naturalness, the opening act, Downchild Blues Band (Canadian. Two albums on Special records—'Bootleg' and 'Straight Up'), was all flash and no substance, or almost none. Don Walsh is a fine harmonica and guitar player. The female pianist is also good (apologies for not catching her name), if inexperienced, which showed in her tendency to repeat herself after a time. But Rick (the Hock) Walsh was a parody. After two or three songs they began to pall, and after an hour they produced nausea in my companion, who is a sensitive creature. The evening almost ended right there.

Malevolence lurks behind the mundane

At the Central Library Theatre, the Menagerie Players are presenting Harold Pinter's The Birthday Party. Director John

Wood and designer Kevin Smith have rescued the text from the Central Library's theatre shelves and given the play its proper place in the intimate theatre on the third floor.

A piano has the first word, playing as the lights come up on the scene of an aptly green-at-the-gills living-room of a seaside boarding house in the south of England. At first the notes are perfunctory, like a child practising his scales, then they increase in tempo, climaxing in a maniacal arpeggio. The piano also has the last word in a hollowly haunting, strangely naive bracket.

These are appropriate leit-motifs for Stanley Webber, the central character in The Birthday Party. A failed pianist, he has taken shelter from the concert circuit—today Lower Edmonton, tomorrow Brighton Pier—in the seedy boarding house run by Meg and Petey 'Boles. The Boleses treat Stanley like a son, perhaps to Meg he is more than that. Myopic, uniformed in pyjamas, and sporting a prison pallor, Stanley never ventures outside. Goldberg and McCann arrive unexpectedly to 'bring him out of himself'. Who they represent is a matter for conjecture. They soon, however, make Stanley a suitable case for treatment. From dropout to washout, Graham Harley's Stanley deftly manages all the necessary gear changes in the role. He is a very compelling performance, particularly as the 'new man' at the end of the play.

For the most part the production does considerable service to Pinter's comedy of menace formula: make the audience feel at home in the domestic and familiar, then gradually, almost imperceptibly, introduce menace and mystery. The first act scene between Vivienne Gibbs' Meg and David Beard's Petey successfully creates an atmosphere of the disarmingly commonplace, when, that is, they were not reaching too hard after a semblance of desultory conversation. On the other hand, act two's taut orchestration nicely generates the terrifying climax of the birthday party. Sol Mandisohn's commandingly executed Goldberg keeps one guessing at the intentions of the intruders. However, Peter Higginson's McCann, who has great moments of deadpan comedy, betrays too early the malevolence which he and his partner represent. Nevertheless, Higginson's journeyman thug is a nice complement to Mandisohn's brand of executive suite brutality.

In the main the cast is well balanced and the performances individually excellent. Vivienne Gibbs' Meg is most memorable, as is Louise Whitney in the vignette part of Lulu. Locating the play in the late fifties, the time of its composition, does not do justice to Whitney, whose costume suggests Sandra Dee manqué. This Lulu is not a 'bouncy girl'; her endowments cried out for a Dolly Bird of the sixties.

There are only two opportunities left to see the play: tonight and tomorrow night.

Paperchase is apple pie but cinnamoned; Way We Were not bad — for Hollywood

At the end of The Paperchase a law student proves himself to his girlfriend by making a paper airplane out of his unopened examination results and gliding it into Nantucket Sound. He had gotten 93; we saw the figure on an exam book in an earlier scene. While the student doesn't know that we do, presumably he has a pretty good idea of his grades. Most A students do. So his act is really gratuitous, a symbol for a girlfriend who demands symbols. But what about the movie's leaking the mark to us? The film panders as much as the student; in fact it panders more because it is an attempt to have the cake and eat it. If writer-director James Bridges were the student he would have waited for the girl to be out of sight and then fished out the soggy envelope. The character's gesture is what we used to call in the New Left "contestative". The director's is what we used to call cowardly.

You can't take The Paperchase seriously even for a minute without noticing how phony or stupid it all is. Otherwise I liked it. In fact, I liked it enough to want to see it again and figure out what it did right. I'm not a romantic about movies. I like to know how something that works works, or if it doesn't, why it doesn't. Stupid movies generally don't work. If the plot is contrived, if what the characters do is unconnected and arbitrary, if they operate in a void, if no points are made in an hour and three-quarters, I usually don't like the picture. But for all its emptiness waffling and forelocktugging, I liked Paperchase.

This is a formula picture: boy, girl and bully. Timothy Bottoms plays the hero, a freshman at an absurdly cartooned Harvard Law School, as clean a fellow as the cowboy who used to walk into the saloon and order a sarsaparilla. He looks different, as Alan Ladd looked different from William S. Hart. Bottoms looks like Mark Spitz. His hair is medium length as is his mustache. He's cute, nice, smart, vaguely dissatisfied (the vagueness is as important as dissatisfaction), respectful of his elders, of his youngsters—in short, a boy for several current seasons, a new breed diplomat. He does break into buildings a lot, but no one seems to mind. And he does score a 93.

Bottoms is pitted against Prof. Kingsfield (John Houseman) who exudes contract law as a dragon exhales smoke. The girl is, sigh, the professor's daughter. She is the one who melts at Bottom's post-exam heroics. Her cynicism about the law is a little unprecedented (Natalie Wood never felt that way) but it too is pretty vague. With all the good reasons to be cynical about law, she isn't given to say any. Paperchase is nowhere near so advanced as Great Expectations. Such movies as this tease, but they remain deep apple-pie—just a little more heavily cinnamoned to appease the nolsy complaints of the last college generation.

By constantly edging its bets, The Paperchase undercuts even its relatively good points. Prof. Kingsfield for all his tyranny, loves the law and is out to make lawyers of his charges, the way a master sergeant drums any dangerous hesitation out of his men. Bottoms cottons to this. Nothing new here, but even this discovered respect is a sham because Kingsfield's viscous Socratic assaults have as much to do with law or education as atrocities have to do with battle. The kids that hate his class are right, it's the film-makers that have been hoodwinked. If Bottoms has correctly discovered the way in which judicial lore is maintained, his insight is the result of compounding errors.

But still I liked the movie and because of the very tradition that makes it so bad. It has nice Hollywood pace and while it's always dumb it's never dull. It's a poor tale told well. Houseman does a good villain and Bottoms makes an affable hero.

Being ungullible doesn't protect you against being a soft touch. While I didn't applaud when Bottoms told Houseman "You are a son of a bitch" (some of the audience at the Hyland did) and while I didn't laugh with good-fellowship when Houseman replied, "That is the smartest thing I've heard today", my reticence was only in degree, I, er, cried at the end of Carousel when Billy Bigelow had to leave New England and return to Heaven while the sun set and his daughter and her schoolmates sang "You'll Never Walk Alone." I would like to think that it was as much because it was so awful as in spite of it.

THE WAY WE WERE at the Odeon-York is not notably courageous either, but it certainly embarrasses Paperchase. In the first scene, Katie Morosky a Jewish Communist from the Bronx, addresses a 1937 campus anti-war rally where she is jovially heckled in the argot of the time ("K-k-k-Katie be my c-c-c-comrade"). Still, she gets her message across, and to the audience as well as to the rally. Now admittedly peace is one of the safer of Communist causes, and the makers of The Way We Were didn't let Katy be convincing about a strike. However, it is only a couple of years since anti-war sentiments were pretty unpopular and sometimes even dangerous.

I knew about the rally before I went the The Way We Were and I went, in bad faith, to see how Hollywood would gut the Morosky character, removing, as is in the custom, the radical's heart and mind leaving only shrillness and unexplained anger. However, this is an exceptional Hollywood movie. It bent over backwards to be fair to Katie (who in real life would be much more shrill than she is portrayed) and to her equally vulnerable husband, an uncommitted and ultimately sold-out screenwriter. Laurent and Pollack (writer and director) look kindly on the way we were with none of the leering nostalgia (hiding bitterness) that flavours most movies set in the recent past.

To be sure The Way We Were is no The Emigrants no Cries and Whispers, even no Between Friends. There are dull patches and it is difficult to follow the fifteen year chronology: I suspect a good deal of footage, some of it important, has been cut. There are plenty of faults. Robert Redford keeps lounging and posing and showing off his teeth. There is a scene of love-making by a fire-place. But there is also a party where everyone comes as a Marx Brother, an absurd, hilarious idea that works perfectly. For everything bad in this movie there is something good. Above all, it is well-written. How often can you say that?

If my bad faith stemmed principally from Hollywood's history of political sucking up, it was confirmed in Barbra Streisand's presence. I think she's a ham and I have thought so ever since she became a star. For me she is Dean Martin, Rod McKuen, record-players in cabinets, the Desiderata. She is the ideal entertainer for TV specials. But here, after a disgustingly schlocky title tune, she stops emoting and acts. The reviews I read gave me the impression she would be waving all over the screen. Instead I thought she was subdued in a dangerously broad part. It was a fine performance.

Robert Redford isn't bad, but he needs his teeth snagged.

The Way We Were is proving to be a box-office smash, perhaps the biggest since The Poseidon Adventure. I don't go to big, hit movies much because after a point quality drops as popularity rises. The Way We Were is in the Love Story genre alright, but it is the best of the genre. If it were representative of big box-office pictures—it isn't—the state of the culture would be pretty healthy.

Stevie Wonder has flair, good music too

Inner Visions
Stevie Wonder
Motown (Ampex); $6.29

Stevie Wonder is smooth. He's got a beautiful soul voice and acres of musical ability coupled with an unerring sense of taste. This new album he's put out, Inner Visions is a solid success. Despite a fair amount of what I feel is deadwood and throwaway material, there's so much on the record that glows with funky life that you can't help liking it. Perhaps Wonder's strongest suit is his ability to carefully skirt the traps that soul music frequently falls into, without ever falling in himself. Soul is as much a concept as a musical style and often the musical element becomes submerged in a welter of monotonous rhythmic repetition devoid of melody, harmonic structure or meaningful lyrics. That's when soul's aspect of "showmanship" takes over and becomes a monster mowing down everything in its path. It's marvelous as one facet of the many sides of soul music, but should never replace the music itself. Stevie Wonder is never content to produce just "showmanship". Although you can tell it's an important part of the music, it's always kept as a handmaiden to other musical values, without being the whole story.

Side 1 opens with, believe it or not, a dope song, of a light sort. The form is rightly thought to be pretty well dead, but Stevie manages to wring it out one more time. "Too High" is based on a jumpy little riff that settles to the back of the head and keeps things cooking all the way through.

The second song, "Visions" opens on flowing arpeggios and soulful words and voice treatment. Pretty warm, but like most of the rest of this side, a little dull. Honourable mention should be given to the synthesizer work on "Living in the City", one of the songs, the others being "Higher Ground" and "Jesus Children of America" on which Stevie plays all the instruments. The synthesizer playing is not only perfectly adapted to Stevie's style, it's also highly appropriate to the song.

Side 2 begins with "Higher Ground", highlighted with wah-wah guitar. This song had received well deserved airplay on radio and has become an AM hit. And it's not even the best song on this side. With the exception of "Jesus Children of America", all the others here are at least equally strong. "All in Love is Fair" is a torchy ballad sung with perfect control of warm tone and vibrato. It's reminiscent of Roberta Flack's "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face", but more intense. Listen to the magnificent high notes.

"Don't You Worry 'Bout a Thing" is perhaps the best song on the album. It begins with a rapid-fire rap in Spanish and English, illuminated by Latin percussion and feeling. I can't understand a word but it sounds terrific anyway. Whimsical words and an arresting musical device which might be technically termed "chains of suspensions" (a characteristic of the baroque era) round the song off. "His Mistress Know-It-All" provides a smooth conclusion to the album and features some respy Satchmo type tuba singing and a super-drawn-out fadeout. A fine record and an impressive achievement for Stevie Wonder.

Canadian rock is competent but unoriginal

Ken Tobias
The Magic's In The Music
MCM (Polydor); $6.29

A Foot In Coldwater
The Second Foot In Coldwater
Daffodil (Capitol); $6.29

Ken Tobias' The Magic's In The Music, and The Second Foot In Coldwater by a group called A Foot In Coldwater are two new records recently become prominent on the Canadian music scene. You can say one thing about the Canadian music industry - it never quits. The problem is that although all sorts of musicians get their start in Canada (like the Guess Who), it seems that as soon as they surface, they're off to the U.S. and the big bucks, leaving us with nonentities and pallid imitations of internationally popular music styles. The present two records belong in the latter category.

Ken Tobias mines again the once rich vein of country rock. With some exceptions his music is pleasant enough - "Keep On Changing" for example is a decent tune. But as far as originality goes, forget it. There is nothing on the album to distinguish it from an effort by any competent Saskatchewan country and western bar band. Not only that but on numerous occasions he descends into some of the rankest country corn this side of Flin-Flon.

Take "My My" for example:

My, my can't you hear me sing,
Oh yeah run ting-a-ling.
No, no baby please don't go,
Yes, yes I love you so.

If you don't think that is particularly soul-stirring you might try listening to "The Second Foot In Coldwater". This one begins with a truly fine introduction to the first song, but it goes nowhere, and is followed by yet another introduction, which leads into, guess what, another introduction, and another on top of that. By the time they finally start the song itself they've totally lost their momentum and we're treated to a lousy riff topped off by even fuzzier and muddier lead guitar work. Basically not much can be said about the album - it's a straight copy of styles you enjoyed so much in the late sixties delivered by Led Zepplin, Jeff Beck, Mountain et al. Even background vocals by the Bathurst Heights Secondary School Chamber Choir don't help. But catch this group's promo literature: "This quintet, one of the true originals in Canadian music, was voted 'most likely to succeed' by Mr. E.L. Wistey of Oshawa - and the word is spreading!"

Classics get some new twists

Ekseptional Classics: The Best of Ekseption
Phillips (London); $6.29

To understand this record one needs to know the various ingredients that went into it, and how they were handled. There are ten compositions, including works by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Gershwin, and Khachaturian, a five-man band from Holland and a symphony orchestra. Under the guiding hand of Rick van der Linden who plays piano, spinet, Hammond organ, pipe organ, mellotron, and ARP synthesizer, Ekseption not only rewrites the classics but has refreshed them with contemporary arrangements.

Yet throughout their recordings there is no attempt to overshadow the original foundation of the compositions. They are enhanced by the furious drumming of Peter de Leeuwe and the sinuous bass guitar of Cor Dekker, and right from the basic tense coda of the opening bars, played by an orchestra, to break into a joyous fanfare of drums, horns and piano. The orchestra re-enters only to be swept aside by the organ and horns, and finally both sides are united in the climax of the closing bars.

Throughout the record the two remaining members of the band, Rein van der Broek on trumpet and flugelhorn and Dick Remelink on alto and tenor saxophones serve not only to balance out the organ and piano but also inject a rhythmic upbeat throughout the ten cuts. Although the playing of the piano, organ and spinet by van der Linden is the focus of the band, they all have their moments of brilliant solo work which helps to identify each member.

All the cuts are worth listening to, although my favourites are the renditions of "Rhapsody in Blue" with its languorous opening, an incredible version of "Sabre Dance", and "Concerto". My only regret is the fact that most of the cuts are rather short and as such don't allow the band to really develop their ideas, forcing them, as on "Rhapsody in Blue", to perform the song in just four minutes of fast paced playing.

I would have preferred a double album which could have balanced the original works of Ekseption with their arrangements of the classical pieces. It would have offered the listener a chance to listen to some of their longer works where they are able to evolve not just rhythm, but melody and harmony with an orchestral texture.

Blues harp Bach is no novelty

The Pocket Bach
George Fields, four-octave Chromatic and bass harmonicas
Angel

Bach on the harmonica? Uhhh... the harmonica? Now, let's just set up here for a spell. We've had Bach on everything from Moog Synthesizer to Japanese hickiricki to penguin chorus, but this is the very first recording on the ole blues harp.

George Fields took up the violin at the age of eight but busted the thing over his knee to get back at his teacher, a joyless twit who tweaked his ears when he wouldn't perform up to par. When a harmonica came his way, he took to it with a passion, soon learning Brahms' Hungarian Dance #5 by ear. Eventually he transcribed everything from "Scheherazade" to the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, and with gold medal in pocket went off to seek his fortune.

With a shortage of harmonica players who could read music, Fields was soon in demand in Hollywood's film music circles. But all the time, his interest in classical music simmered. Eventually, he learned the techniques of studio multi-tracking, and started to record himself in glorious stereophonic sound.

Even though the instrument was around in the classical and romantic era, there was no music written for it, and so serious performers have always had to turn to transcriptions of older music (although in this century many composers have written concertos and sonatas for the harmonica, it's only a beginning). Fields always liked Bach, and worked his way up from the relatively easy two-part inventions to the technical showpieces from the well-tempered clavier.

How do they sound, though? Well... like a lot of harmonicas going at once, with dexterity and rhythmic flexibility like you've never heard from this relatively unwieldy instrument. The range is something else, too — by using special bass harmonicas, he was able to get organlike sonorities within the multitracked final mix. The way he handles trills and other aspects of Baroque ornamentation really have to be heard to be believed.

It's easy enough to see this disc as a novelty item, but it really isn't. It's the careful, well-thought out presentation of familiar music on an unfamiliar instrument by a total virtuoso master. It certainly took me a few hearings to get used to the damn thing, but it's a sprightly, fun thing. Get it for laughs or get it for the music, but don't miss out on the most unique Bach record of the year.

See — I wonder if he'd try a Mahler symphony? Just for fun, mind you.

Bernstein shines with new Carmen

Every time I hear Carmen, I want to scream out, "Don Jose, you schmuck! You had things going great with Micaela, why do you run after Carmen?" I guess the old cigarette-rolling tart must have had something going for her, alright, because she acts as the moving force in a drama of love, death and personal ruin. Too often, however, the role of Don Jose is relegated to that of a bystander in the musical process of letting the star soprano show off, what's more, the opera has almost invariably been presented in the form not intended by the composer.

When Bizet wrote Carmen, he went against the grain of the times and had the characters speak their lines between the major musical numbers, rather than sing them in recitative style. The Opera Comique was the home of spoken lines but there had never been death on the Comique's stage; nevertheless, Bizet insisted that his work be presented in the house of comedy; the Opera simply wouldn't hear of spoken interludes. As it turned out, the premiere was less than a success, and after the composer's death recitatives were added in. The opera then ascended the ladder of popularity with great speed.

But in the past few years, Leonard Bernstein has been championing the cause of the spoken lines, and he finally had a chance to present his case in the fall of 1972 at New York's Metropolitan Opera. It proved to be the most astounding change; critics hailed it as the only "right" way to see Bizet's greatest work.

This is the very first time that Bernstein has appeared on Deutsche Grammophon, and the German record company pulled out all the stops for him, even taking their Production crews to New York to do the recording. This is a courageous move in light of the tremendous costs of recording an opera on this side of the Atlantic today; this was the first one done in over seven years, and the cost must have been astronomical.

Part of the reason for the high cost was the star roster engaged to sing the roles. Nothing less than the original Met cast would do, so we have one of the most exciting Carmens ever pressed onto vinyl in the person of Marilyn Horne. Jose is ably sung by James McCracken, and the treader Escamillo is played by Tom Krause. This high-powered cast brings out so much of the detail and bravura in the score, and pulls it off with such a degree of panache that one really wishes one could have been there to hear the live performance.

I'd be shocked to hear Horne or McCracken turn in a performance less than good on a record (let alone a live performance) but in so many opera recordings nothing comes close to the quality of the star material.

Much of the credit must go to Leonard Bernstein, of course. From the prelude to the climactic killing scene, the whole production is shaped to his demands, and sense of drama propels the whole thing along with tension and an internal force all its own. Almost from Carmen's first entrance, we know that this latest flirtation will cost her dearly, and when it claims her life at the end it doesn't seem out of place with the tension created in the first scenes.

DG's production is the antithesis of that of London and Angel; this must be the most lavish opera set I've ever seen. The competition has been skimping lately on performer's biographies and histories of the opera recorded, but this set has them in spades. Two essays on Carmen, one on Bizet, lengthy biographies on the performers, and a place on the production itself accompany the libretto, which is loaded with full-page colour pictures of the action, contributing even more to the "you-are-there" feeling of the music. The recording is dolby-quieted and wide-stage enough to catch the sweep of the crowd scenes.

In short, the best Carmen ever recorded. Ask for it for Xmas.

Schumann set is too expensive

Schuman Edition, Volume I
Piano Works (part one)
Karl Engel, piano
Telefunken SKA 25082

Glenn Gould once remarked of Deutsche Grammophon, "Give them time — eventually they'll come out with the complete works of Frescobaldi". This sort of attitude seems to characterize the big German record companies. They go for big, prestigious editions of composer's complete works. In 1970, DG set a precedent with the complete works of Beethoven in an impressive Beethoven Edition, and last year Telefunken started a complete series of Bach Cantatas. Each box features the lyrics, commentary and a miniature score, and the boxes (at around $12 a shot) have been selling as quickly as London Records, the importer, has been able to bring them in. Clearly, the complete-works bug has bitten on this side of the Atlantic as well.

Now comes Schumann, the middle-Romantic composer, in a complete edition. Telefunken hasn't yet released details of the total series, but it looks like a big one. The volume at hand contains about half of the piano music, and the box is labelled "Volume I" and is complete down to the gold-stamped "I" on the side. So much for the packaging, which is handsome and elegant — but what of the performance?

Karl is virtually unrepresented in the catalogue, and it's nice to have a pianist with as much technique as he obviously possesses get a break from the record company. While his interpretations aren't what one would expect from a renowned master like Horowitz or Rubenstein, it's clear that what he has to offer is what the producers of the series wanted. His playing is forthright, clear and eminently suited to the music. If anything, his personal presence as a musician seems to be minimal. Could it be that the same people who gave us Bach-without-emotion (the bunch who advocate total fidelity to the performance practice of the era when the music was written, and interpretation be damned) are revving up for a Schubert in the same class?

If this is the case, it may be that Engel's Schumann is just a portent of things to come. But a propos of these gloomy mutterings, his playing really does come off well. If the rest of the series is like this it'll be okay; not brilliant, or world-shaking, just o.k. Since an edition like this is obviously striving for authenticity, what the listener is going to get will be authentic — but just a wee bit on the dull side.

In terms of price, it's no bargain, with the big stores retailing it for around $24. If it set were on a budget label, I'd easily recommend it for anyone starting up a collection of Romantic piano music. At this tab, it's basically for the wealthy few who can afford it. The pressings themselves are typical of Telefunken — flawless, but very expensive.

Cinematek, a new repertory cinema located at 2637 Yonge St., between Eglinton and Lawrence, opens this week with a rare showing of Busby Berkeley's most opulent colour extravaganza, The Gang's All Here.

The film has something for one and all: Benny Goodman, Alice Faye, and Carmen Miranda; unforgettable songs like "The Lady in the Tutti-Frutti Hat" and "Paducah" (You can rhyme it with bazooka); along with indescribable production numbers which one critic described anyway as "kaleidoscopic patterns of female flesh dissolving into artichokes." A virtual psychedelicatesen, perhaps most revealingly described in an original 1934 review: "it's colossal, it's stupendous, and one of the artist's productions ever made... too few good, entertaining numbers are overpowered by too much art."

In December Cinematek begins its regular repertory program with a really outstanding selection of films ranging from Les Enfants du Paradis to that greatest of all Canadian films, Rose Marie, and including Lubitsch's To be or not to be, Albicocco's The Wanderer, and Satajit Ray's Days and Nights in the Forest along with King Kong, Beyond the Valley of the Dolls and many, many more great hits.

Cinematek also operates a Visual Arts Centre which plans workshops in various film making skills; lectures by well-known writers, directors, and critics; mixed media presentations and a "Canadian film making skills; lectures by well-known tained by calling 487-9445.

Phil Filler from the law school called to defend the existence of The Projectionist. He claims he saw it and says he knows others (all Americans) who have seen it equally. They liked it he says. It starred Chuck McCann the big lout who says "hi, guys" on the Right Guard commercial, and Rodney Dangerfield. Very convincing but the ultimate test is not scheduled for this week.

There are movies I want to see most every night next week: Sunday at St. Mike's John Korty's Riverrun - I don't know much about it but I've got a hunch it's good. Monday at Ontario College of Art it's Max Ophüls' Lola Montez. Max Ophüls was the father of Marcel "Sorrow and the Pity" Ophüls. At the Revue Monday and Tuesday is a double-bill by Bo Widerberg, Joe Hill and Adelen '31, lyrical, political movies by the maker of Elvira Madigan pretty, pretty, pretty. The rest of the week it's Dennis Hopper's Kid Blue and Jeff Bridges as the Last American Hero who drives stock cars or some such. Wednesday at noon the U.C. French Department shows Quebec film-maker Pierre Perrault's Les Volontés d'Eau. Friday at 8 it's Bresson's Le Journal d'un Curé de Campagne. Films shown in U.C. 106, free, but no sub-titles. And on Thursday at the Roxy it's Martian Space Party and Charlots of the Gods. The latter is one of the cleverest, lowest pieces of propaganda ever created. Ideally it would be double-billed with The Swiss Jew, if all the copies weren't destroyed when the Third Reich collapsed. See how many hidden errors you can uncover.

And the Kensington will play I Even Met Happy Gypsies at the end of the month. Is the pen mightier than the sword? bb

theatre

After a mixed bag of themes and styles in Toronto theatre so far this season, a surprising number of new shows are all structured on social documentary or "actuality" drama. Sticks and Bones, a blackly comic family and social satire, playing at Hart House Theatre until Nov. 24, is the first insinuation of this trend. It expresses itself more fully with Toronto Free Theatre's newest production Vallières, which previews Nov. 21. Written by Paul Thompson and Penny Williams and directed by Michel Gelinas, the play is based on the trials of Pierre Vallières. In Then Both Of Us, which follows ace reporter Sam Samson out after THE big story. It opened Nov. 14, with student tickets at $2.00 and 8:30 rush seats at $1.50. And The Group of Seven and the Case of the Glowing Pine, a fun Canadian satire continues indefinitely at the Poor Alex.

books

We need people who are interested in reviewing books (or magazines, journals, libraries, the press, bookstores, the Canadian publishing industry, adult games, children's games, label buttons, multiple orgasms, course reading lists, Canadian historiography, graffiti, the subway system, all-night bars, the first snowfall of winter, department store Santas; construction site posters, or most anything else). Reviewing should be a broad field, dealing with all aspects of culture, not just the traditional institutionalized categories. Culture concerns human experience and perception, and how they are communicated; it's a limitless field. So if you have an idea, please come over to St.

YMCA. It's behind the Y. Call 489-3001 if you get lost.

Lighthouse is one Canadian band that always showed a lot of promise. Things looked especially bright after they left RCA for the GRT label, and got themselves a strong lead vocalist in Bob McBride. But there have been difficulties in the last year. McBride left the group to work solo and an original member, Paul Hoffert, who was largely responsible for the group's arrangements as well as playing vibes and keyboards, left to concentrate on management. Undaunted, the group has decided to plunge ahead without a lead vocalist. The result has been recorded on an LP titled, "Can You Feel It" (GRT). The vocals are at best passable. The band's down to nine members now and only five of those were on their last album. Lighthouse will appear in concert tonight at Massey Hall.

Two good Toronto groups that deserve more listeners are on tap at the El Mocambo, Spadina below College this week. Rick 'the Hog' Walsh and his brother Donny are leading the Downchild Blues Band in their fourth birthday celebrations upstairs. Downstairs you can find Chris Kearny and his rock 'n' roll band Pemican.

Have you heard the one about Bob Bosin's banjo? It seems someone liked it so much that he walked right in to Bob's house and relieved him of it. Bob appeals juxtaposition with this work in Cope, a documentary play about the Toronto police researched by the company. It opens at the Open Circle Theatre (103 Bellevue Avenue at St. Stephen-In-The-Fields Church Hall) on Nov. 21. Tickets are $2.00. And rounding off this seriously committed social documentation is the Tarragon Theatre's next production Sticks and Stones: The Donnelly's Part One, by James Reaney. The play, based on the events leading up to the bizarre murder of the Donnelly family in London, Ontario, 1880, opens Sat. Nov. 24. Special matinee performances are being offered during the school week and if requested, James Reaney along with the cast and director will discuss the play after the performance. Interested parties are advised to call 531-1827 to book a session.

Perhaps Clear Light, now closed by Toronto's morality squad, should have been the culmination and the unfortunate forerunner of the agitative viewpoints.

Even Strindberg's Miss Julie, offered by the Academy of Theatre Arts experimental group, is not much of an escape from social confrontation although the battle of the sexes predominate. Starting Nov. 22, it plays Thurs., Fri., Sat., at the Ward-Price Building, 23 Grenville St. Student tickets are $2.00. A lighter tone is suggested with the Global Village's Bigger

George and suggest it. If you're just generally interested in trying out something new, come and do a review of one of the books we've got on hand (Canadian fiction and poetry are specialties, but there's much else besides). Or call the book review editor at 923-8741.

Fired black worker calls Sunnybrook 'racist'

By TIM GALLAGHER

A charge of racism has been made by a black worker following his firing at Sunnybrook Hospital.

Maxwell Smith, a black worker in the housekeeping department says he was fired "with only a day's notice". Sunnybrook is administered through U of T.

The supervisor responsible for his firing told him it was due to "a poor performance" and "lack of interest," Smith said.

Sunnybrook Hospital Employees Union Local 777, an affiliate of Service Employees International Union, presented Smith's case to the hospital administration.

Phil Tuck, the union president, said the union went to the administration "with the opinion that Smith be reinstated with full benefits."

However, when talks "went to stage three, the union got him (Smith) eleven days severance pay", which the hospital had denied Smith, Tuck said.

Tuck went on to say Smith "had a number of things on his file and had received five letters" which had warned Smith about his work performance. Therefore, the Union felt it couldn't protect his job.

Smith says most of the things he was accused of in the letters were "untrue." Moreover, he said he was reprimanded "for not doing jobs which aren't even in the contract."

He explained although he was in housekeeping he was required to do jobs such as washing food carts in the servery. He feels one reason he was fired was that he "fought back" against breaches of the union's contract.

He said blacks in the housekeeping department are given night shift work without any choice. In his own case, he said, he was put on nights against his wishes.

He pointed out the contract does not allow a person to work more than three months on any one shift but he stayed on nights for "two and one-half years" non-stop.

In addition, shift premiums were not being paid to workers on the night shift, he said. Therefore, he said, since all the workers on nights are black, "blacks not only get the worst shifts but receive the worst pay."

When the union told Smith there wasn't anything they could do, Smith told them he was being "treated unfairly." At this point fellow workers drew up a petition demanding Smith get his job back.

Smith said one shop steward's wife who also works at Sunnybrook phoned him that same day and remarked: "You black people have a chip on your shoulders... why don't you go back to the jungle!"

Another shop steward said "There is no case against him because he wasn't fired when he was doing something wrong."

That is, although Smith may have received letters concerning his work performance, he was not fired as a direct result of any one incident, she said. On conditions at Sunnybrook the steward noted "purely colored men and women are on nights." This has only begun to change as of November 1st of this year, she added.

Also, she said there is a shortage of orderlies and "one man has to do the job of two... an orderly on nights has to do two floors himself."

An orderly at the hospital who has been trying to help Smith get his job back, said that "insufficient job classifications" have resulted in people doing jobs not covered in the union's contract.

He emphasized "good working conditions lead to better patient care." He cited staff cutbacks as the main reason for "speed-up" or extra work.

He mentioned that since the University of Toronto took over the administration of Sunnybrook, working conditions have deteriorated. Quoting hospital statistics, he revealed that in 1966 when the U of T assumed its new duties, there were 300 orderlies at Sunnybrook but at present there are only 197.

Within the last year there have been two persons fired because of racial discrimination, he claimed. One got back his job while the other found another job but received a cash settlement from the hospital. Most of the trouble, he said, has come since the U of T "took over."

The Sunnybrook public relations office stated that four members of the U of T Governing Council are on the Sunnybrook Board of Trustees. They are John R. Evans, President of the University, the Hon Daniel Lang, C. M. King, and W. B. Harris.

Replying to the charges, Tuck stated the supervisor who is an East Indian did not fire Smith for racial reasons. He said: "As you know sometimes black persons don't like working for black supervisors."

Tuck felt there was no racial discrimination at Sunnybrook and said the night shift was "voluntary"... some people prefer nights."

Victory for Morgentaler

MONTREAL (CUP) After 10 hours of deliberation the jury of 11 men and one woman found Dr. Henry Morgentaler not guilty of having performed an illegal abortion.

Morgentaler had admitted to having performed an abortion on the witness for the prosecution, a 26 year-old unmarried graduate student, but maintained that he was entitled to criminal immunity under Section 45 of the Criminal Code.

It stated that no one can be prosecuted for performing an operation that is medically necessary to the patient if reasonable care is taken.

The woman in the case is in Canada as a student, had few friends and little money. She testified on the stand that she intended to obtain an abortion because as a student, she could not afford to raise a child.

By accepting the defence's stand, the jury upheld a more extensive definition of "health and medical necessity" which takes into account both social and economic factors.

Defence lawyer Claude Armand Sheppard expressed surprise that this was the first time Article 45 has been invoked in an abortion trial.

"The Criminal Code is read by everyone who is admitted to the bar... Why did no one else in the past 100 years notice it before?"

Commenting on the verdict Marg Manwaring of the Committee For The Defence of Dr. Henry Morgentaler said: "This is a very great victory because even three years ago you would never have gotten 12 people to agree on this. It is an indication of the impact of the struggle for humane abortion laws on the public."

However, Crown prosecutor Louis Robichaud has announced that he intends to appeal the decision "as soon as possible" to the Supreme Court of Canada.

He plans on basing the appeal on the grounds that Article 45, on which the defence was based, was not legally admissible. He said that the use of this article in the present case was a "judicial absurdity."

At a victory party held November 13 for Morgentaler, Lorraine Fitzgerald, a nurse at his clinic said: "Things will be back to normal tomorrow and I think we'll have a busy day." She went on to say that during the trial it had been necessary to refer women to other doctors or postpone their appointments.

Morgentaler has been charged with 12 other counts of performing illegal abortions but these have been postponed until March at the earliest by Judge James Huggessen, pending appeals.

Nationalism and Socialism don't mix

By WAYNE ROBERTS

Nationalism has no part in a socialist philosophy, and while you can have national concerns, they must be related to social objectives, Doug Rowland, NDP MP for Selkirk said at a OISE lecture Wednesday night.

Canadian corporations are just as likely to violate national objectives as American ones, he argued. The issue is not that foreign capital is more exploitative than Canadian capital but that it causes certain special problems, he said.

Citing cases of American infringement on Canadian sovereignty in matters of trade with Communist nations and the impact of American legislation and policy on branch plants in Canada, Rowland insisted that the NDP could assert legislative control in this area.

Their attempt to fit foreign investment into Canadian needs might even include veto of new American takeovers or nationalization of certain corporations, he said.

Rowland placed his solutions to foreign control of the economy in the context of general social democratic concepts. The major part of his speech therefore dealt with the NDP as a synthesis of the best elements of traditional conservatism and small-liberalism.

Like conservatives, the NDP has an organic view of society and the state and believes in the validity of government intervention to uphold values of the community.

Like liberals, they rank civil liberties and the elimination of arbitrary power high in their value hierarchy.

Their additional devotion to equality necessitates opposition to arbitrary private power as well as arbitrary government power and leads them to value government intervention as a means of attaining social equality, he said.

Within that context, he argued, nationalization was a practical problem. While he believes in principle that government has the right to nationalize companies and subordinate private profit to the needs of the community as a whole, he discounted nationalization as impractical and unnecessary.

It would cost too much and cause too much strain with other nations, he said.

He preferred nationalization in cases of "natural monopolies" and compulsory services like insurance where there is little need for private ownership.

He would also consider nationalization as a technique of securing control of key materials and resources, he said.

The lecture was a philosophical part of the NDP sponsored series on Liberty and Equality. "A neat and elegant summary of social democratic thought," chairman Gordon Vichert stated in his conclusion.

In a more subjective sense it also continues in the tradition of the rest of the series.

"My secretary tells me that my public speaking choices are to drone on from a carefully prepared speech or to fumble around in a completely disjointed way," Rowland apologized to the audience. He read from a carefully prepared speech.

Psychology petition

A meeting of psychology students Wednesday has decided to circulate a petition among first year psychology students protesting the "impersonality" of the first year introductory course that relies on tapes.

Students who attended the meeting complained that the course involved little human contact. Only one professor was available for counselling and this was an "intimidating" situation.

A working group was also set up to organize a meeting in two weeks to discuss this and the issue of setting up humanistic psychology courses with faculty members in the department.

US priorities wrong says heart surgeon

By MARK APPLEY

The United States spends more than 400 times more on defense than it does on research work in coronary disease, according to Dr. Michael DeBakey.

"Something's awry with our priorities," DeBakey said matter-of-factly at Osgoode Hall Tuesday evening to more than 200 persons.

The eminent heart surgeon was referring to the US spending of an equivalent of $400 per person on defense and $40 per person on space programmes, while government expenditure accounted for less than $1 per person in the field of research into coronary disease.

Dr. DeBakey said he felt it was his duty as a physician to enlighten the rest of the public to what he called "faulty" priorities.

DeBakey spoke mainly on operative techniques using slides for illustrative purposes. Such procedures as bi-pass grafts using dacron tubing, resection of aortic aneurisms and transplantation of heart tissue were covered.

In August, 1968, one of his patients received the heart of a 36 year-old man. Today, at 21, Dusan Vlado who was suffering from congestive heart failure just five years ago is a healthy, functioning human being who earns his living as a composer.

DeBakey has performed 11 other transplants all of which have failed to allow the recipients to live beyond a maximum of four years.

Now, Dr. DeBakey, one of the pioneers of the heart-lung machine — an essential for open-heart surgery — is particularly interested in the transplantation of artificial hearts.

"It seems rather inhuman to wait around for people to die in accidents in order to use their hearts. This is one reason why I'm particularly interested in developing the artificial heart — to avoid this," he said understandingly.

Already DeBakey has had cats live for up to a week with almost completely artificial hearts of dacron. "Ultimately," he went on to say, "the prevention of coronary disease will be the answer."

Blues open basketball with surprise losses to replace

By BOB PRITCHARD

Varsity Basketball Blues open their season tonight when they meet the Ottawa Gee Gees at 8:30 in the Benson Building.

When the Blues finished their season last year with a 6-6 record (their best in 5 years), earning them a fourth place tie with York, it looked as if the 73-74 season would definitely see the Blues into the playoffs, with more than just a "wishful thinking" possibility of a championship.

Varsity had all but one man returning for the following season, and were led by Dave Watt, who was not only the Blues' leading scorer, but the number five scorer in the east.

However, things haven't quite worked out as planned for John McManus, who begins his 23 season as basketball coach. As McManus puts it, "We're starting all over."

The Blues don't exactly have to start all over, but there will be a little more work needed than earlier anticipated.

The most noticeable loss will be that of Watt, who has decided to abandon Varsity basketball in favour of a shot at the Olympics in the triple jump. Watt, although not one of the most talked-about players in the league last year, was a steady influence on the Blues line, and his absence will be felt.

Two rookie guards who showed great promise, especially in the latter games of the '71-73 season, are also out of the picture.

Peter Oulup has sustained a knee injury, and won't be with the team until after Christmas.

Bill Francis, the other guard, didn't return to the team.

Dave Ferguson, the Blues' starting centre last year, was lost to graduation. His shoes will be more than adequately filled by Frank Cress, back for his second season with the team.

Looking on the brighter side, Varsity has a solid and experienced starting lineup. Back for their third season are guards Tony Rudmik and Randy Filinski, and forwards Glenn Scott and Brian Skyvington. Rudmik and Filinski have on more than one occasion proven themselves as competent shooters and ball handlers. Scott and Skyvington, both a 6'4", should be able to control the boards and add some muscle.

Also back in their second seasons are Rick Hollowel, who saw extremely limited action last year, and Avo Albo. These two will be expected to provide the badly needed bench strength in the guard positions. Rich Kurczyk returns as a forward.

New to the Blues this year are guards Doug Fox, Rick Hoyle and Munk Gourlie, and forwards Bill Birnbaum and Alex McCormick.

Fox is in his first year, a graduate of Don Mills C.I. Hoyle is also in first year, a graduate of A.Y. Jackson S.S., who were North York finalists.

Gourlie played for the Blues two years ago and has returned after a year in Sweden. Birnbaum, a fourth year student, has played interfac basketball with UC for three years.

McCormick, Blues' tallest man at 6'10½", probably won't see much action until the season gets well underway.

Blues' chief problems this year will be a lack of bench strength, and probably a disadvantage in height. Coach McManus hopes to use a fast break, and will rely on speed and aggressiveness to counteract any height deficit. If the second stringers can come through with some solid support, and the veterans make the most of their experience, the Blues will be right up there with the top teams.

TIP OFFS: Merv Sabey, who has become a permanent fixture in the Gee Gees' basketball club, will be back leading his team against the Blues. Barry Mosley, also originally from Toronto, will be in the Ottawa backcourt. Ottawa finished third in the east last year, 2 points ahead of Toronto. Last year Blues were 1-1 with the Gee Gees.

Blues collapsed vs Ottawa last year after beating Western.

Doctors, Jocks, Foresters catch soccer, lacrosse titles

By CHRIS ROBINSON

Meds and Jr Engineering put on a spectacular display of play-off soccer under terrible conditions of rain and darkness in Varsity Stadium yesterday. The final 3-2 overtime win for Meds was a tribute to their determination in overcoming a more skillful Engineering squad.

The first half featured a barrage of shots on diminutive Meds' goalie Mike Greenspan, who performed heroically, literally saving the entire game for the doctors. The strong Eng defence and good goaltending snuffed out the few Meds' drives.

Midway through the half Masahiro Kawaji broke through in the centre to put in the opening score in the corner. Only a few minutes later Jim Saffrey blasted a shot from the middle of a scramble 25 yards out into the upper left corner and the half ended 1-1.

Both teams continued to display good ball control and clever tactics in pitching out to the wings to avoid the centre mudbowl. Engineers finally made it pay as Guy-Dick Lam took a low cross from deep right wing and found the far corner.

Meds refused to give up and pressed even harder. Gradually their superior weight and strength wore down the Engineers, who made errors and failed to clear dangerous rushes.

It went right down to the wire as Meds got their big break with only seconds to go in the game. An unidentified plumber pushed a doctor in the penalty area, and Paul Blusys managed to score on a poor shot that slipped through the diving goalie's arms.

In the overtime it was all Meds. Both sides had suffered injuries and were exhausted, but the red and black skull crests found new reserves of energy, striking oil when Bryan McLelland counted the winner early in the first overtime half.

Engineers tried to come back, but they couldn't summon the power, and Meds easily held to win their second consecutive Arts Cup second division title.

Dafoc PHE lacrosse action provided no surprises in the first division finals last night as Phys Ed added yet another to its long string of titles.

The opening play was extremely tight as Vic abandoned its keying defence in favour of a modified closed zone box. The result was that PHE got fewer chances for picks and screen shots while Vic had fewer open breaks.

The Vic goalie again played well to hold them in until a bad break only seconds before half-time. With the score tied 3-3, Vic's Butler bounced a wide shot off the back wall and down the floor. Jock Nell Sorbie and the goalie both tried to pick it up, but it bounced around and into the net.

The second half started with two fast PHE goals and they never looked back as they went on to wrap it up 9-4. Both teams deserve credit for the exciting clean brand of lacrosse they provided for the spectators in the two games.

In the second division final the foresters showed the boys from Trinity a few things about axework and lacrosse.

The defence was the storey as For hosed their Mann-to-man coverage and bled them White to the tune of 13-4. The score was 7-0 at the half, largely on the strength of screen shots and shots from throw-ins.

In the second half Trinity seemed to learn how to check and score, but the game effectively ended when Bill Mann soloed for a short-handed goal, making it 8-2 after John Wilson and Jamie Beaton had scored.

Mann and Paul Hosick with four, and Bill White with three were the major lumberjacks. Ernie Harris and Dale Draper netted singles. The other Trinity goals came on a pair in the fourth by Ian Storey.

Interfaculty rugby semi-finals put Eng I and Trin A into the finals today at 1:15 for the Nankivell Cup.

In the PHE-Eng I encounter, the jocks grabbed an early lead off a penalty kick by Ken Sullivan. As always this season, they failed to provide any more scoring punch.

Martin Reader went around the blind side of a scrum for a try, converted by Bob Cherniak, and that stood up for a 6-3 final score for Eng I.

Trinity A had little trouble disposing of Eng II 14-4. Tom Bell of the Blues' second XV counted two tries with Martin Knowles converting one of them. Jim Tory held them up for another, while some unidentified Engineer scored an unconverted try.

GAA drive nets 35 per cent

"We're pushing for more"

By DICK BROWN

Despite a lack of co-operation from U of T's administration, the drive by the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) to achieve certification of the GAA as bargaining agent is a step closer to success.

Michael O'Keefe, president of the GAA, says with still two weeks to go, the month-long effort to sign up the last 200 assistants needed to apply for certification "has been totally successful."

Those 200 signers bring the GAA's strength up to about 700, which O'Keefe says is the necessary 35 per cent of the estimated 2,000 graduate assistants needed to apply for certification with the Ontario Labor Relations Board (OLRB).

"But we're pushing for more," O'Keefe says. "We'd like as close to 50 per cent as possible."

However, O'Keefe says the results so far have been despite Simcoe Hall, which has refused the GAA the master list of all graduate assistants at U of T.

The GAA formally requested the list October 22, and after follow up phone calls, had not received the list by Friday.

"It's clear the university is fighting us on the list," O'Keefe says. "But it's obvious it's not stopping us."

He says in one department, the GAA had signed up 104 per cent of the assistants. The reason for the unusual figures, he said, was because the department itself did not have a complete list of assistants, but GAA recruiters found them anyway.

O'Keefe says the GAA is hoping to make the formal application for certification in January. At the time of application, he said, the OLRB will subpoena the master list and the GAA will get access to it.

The master list is important, he says, because it is the only way to determine the exact number of assistants working at the university. He says the GAA's estimate of 2,000 is a "maximum" estimate.

While the GAA is organizing, it has also been trying to get back vacation pay for assistants.

Last week the GAA received the provincial government's ruling on their application for back vacation pay, a ruling in two parts.

First, the government said graduate assistants are eligible for vacation pay; and second, the university does not have to pay out back vacation pay because assistants are already getting paid holidays.

The ruling said the paid holidays are two weeks during the Christmas break, one week during reading week, and the last two weeks of April.

O'Keefe said the GAA is taking the second part of the ruling back to the ministry of labor for an appeal this week. But he termed the ruling a "victory" because he said the university wanted assistants ruled ineligible for any vacation pay and the government ruled assistants are eligible.

He says the appeal will include specific cases—a majority according to O'Keefe—where assistants have to work during these periods. In some cases these include hourly time sheets.

"In Engineering, for instance, they have to work during reading week," O'Keefe said.

The GAA says U of T assistants do more than 40 per cent of the undergraduate teaching and receive on average wage of less than $1,000 per year. Wages range from about $500 to $1,800 "and that's frequently for the same amount of work," O'Keefe says.

By contrast, the University of Windsor association—which is not certified by the OLRB but is recognized by that university—has won a uniform $2,400 wage, a grievance procedure and a voice in departmental hiring committees.

The president of the Windsor association, Frank Miller, told a U of T assistants meeting last week U of T's drive would result in the first union of teaching assistants in Canada.

McGill TA's follow U of T union drive

MONTREAL (CUP) — Teaching assistants (TAs) in the sociology department at McGill University have called for the creation of a union of TAs from McGill's various departments.

This action, taken at a recent meeting follows organizing actions by TAs in the political science and economics departments.

Unlike the TAs in those departments, however, the sociology workers are not just organizing their department, but are working for an inter-departmental organization.

Malcolm Alexander, a member of the liaison committee, set up to work with TAs in other departments, said sociology TAs prefer an interdepartmental union because they feel adequately represented within their own department now.

Alexander said that 20 of the 22 TAs in sociology approved the move.

The statement said a TA union would help in getting "office supplies, participation in decision making and access to the support services related to teaching needs" for TAs.

At present sociology TAs have to pay for their own office supplies and are not provided with telephones and typewriters.

The statement also says a union would help work out "guidelines establishing an equitable relation between income and work levels in all departments."

The union, the statement says, would also deal with payment for French courses. Alexander says TAs, unlike professional and secretarial staff, are not paid for French courses taken.

Besides the liaison committee, the meeting set up a committee to investigate how Quebec's classification system affects TAs and a group to look into other teaching organizations.

Council may stall discipline

By PAUL McGRATH

Internal Affairs chairwoman Marie Paikin announced Thursday that she would recommend to the Governing Council that no vote be taken on the Discipline Code at the next Governing Council meeting.

The recommendation follows a week of student protest and planned demonstrations prior to the meeting this Thursday.

A meeting last Wednesday in Sidney Smith Hall resulted in an overwhelming rejection of the code, which was given approval in principle by the Governing Council last June, after the end of the academic year.

In a release from the administration, Paikin said: "Both the Internal Affairs and the Academic Affairs Committees have continuing responsibilities to monitor the implementation and recommend changes to the Code and Structures as they are deemed appropriate."

"To this end, the committees will continue to receive and consider all responsible suggestions for amendments."

Paikin added that there would be a lengthy period between approval and implementation of the code, time enough for "comment on substantive issues."

SAC sees the move as an attempt to tide the issues over until a time when students will be involved in exams or vacations and "to make it seem as if they are willing to incorporate changes."

THE Varsity TORONTO

Vol. 94, No. 29
Nov. 19, 1973

"We must be clear that the ultimate aim of the administration is to have the Code implemented essentially as is, because it gives them the arbitrary power to act on matters of discipline."

The SAC press release warned students not to be "lulled into a false sense of security" and asked that the tabling motion state explicitly that the Code will not be dealt with while students are either off campus or preparing for exams.

SAC looks upon the tabling motion as a partial victory for the students, one "which gives organizers more time to gain support for the move to completely reject the Code."

So far the Code has been rejected by all three student councils (SAC, GSU and AFUS) all eight students presently seated on the Governing Council and the Faculty Reform Caucus.

Ratepayers opposed to athletic field house

By ANDREW FALUDY

A proposal for a new athletic field house which goes to the Internal Affairs committee today drew a reaction from the chairman of the Huron-Sussex resident's association.

Tom Harper, commenting on the athletic task force's proposal for a 58,900 square foot field house on the northeast corner of Spadina Avenue and Harbord Street said: "I am optimistic that they will not place it there."

Harper added the ratepayers were informed in good time and he was not surprised that the community was not represented on the task force.

"We wouldn't expect them to ask us," he said.

Doug Myers, the chairman of the ratepayers' standing committee said he will submit a statement to the Internal Affairs committee today opposing the field house.

Myers summed up the ratepayers' point of view, saying they were opposed to "any further destruction of residential buildings."

The proposed field house "would mean the destruction of ten houses and a student residence," he added.

Myers described the effect of the proposed new building on the neighborhood. He painted a picture of the houses which would remain wedged in between the Roberts Library and the new field house.

"Not a nice place to live," he commented.

Myers said he felt communications between ratepayers and the university were fairly good. He said the ratepayers were informed "reasonably early."

A discussion with John Evans had also been fruitful. "We easily reached an agreement that documents which could affect the neighbourhood should be made available as soon as possible."

He found it "a hopeful sign" the university had informed the ratepayers in good time. Myers spoke of a "different attitude" of the university because "it is less committed to steamroller expansion."

"I hope that by the time funds become available for expansion that the university realizes that downtown neighbourhoods are irreplaceable," he said.

Ward 6 Alderman Dan Heap came out in support of the residents.

"I agree with the residents that they should be consulted. They were afraid that they would be presented with a fait accompli."

He added he thought the field house proposal "not so contentious as the Robert Street (ice rink) proposals."

Heap disclosed he had not been consulted about the proposals. He said although they had been touched upon at a city-university liaison committee meeting last Monday, there had been "no in-depth discussion with aldermen that I am aware of."

Asked whether he had any role in the decision making, he replied with a flat "No."

"I haven't been invited to and haven't sought it."

The proposal for a new field house which goes before the Internal Affairs committee today is not the first of its kind.

Other facility proposals were made in 1963, 1967 and 1972. The 1967 proposal called for over 210,000 square feet.

This area was halved in last year's proposal and has been halved yet again this year.

If the new by-law on development in the downtown area goes into effect, then the projected floor space of 58,900 feet will be in excess of the by-law's maximum of 40,000 square feet.

The university could still apply for an exemption from the restrictions on the bylaw, but to date Simcoe Hall has not done so.

The Varsity—Bob Gauthier

The new athletic field house is planned for the bare spot in this picture, and residents are upset.

Back from down under

If you notice a few people on campus with slight suntans and a bit of a drawl in their voice, take note that this year's edition of the Carolina Exchange has returned from down south a little tired but greatly relieved by a week's fun, frivolity and friendliness in Chapel Hill, North Carolina.

The week was enjoyed immensely by all those 38 (37 at one point when one errant was left stranded in the nation's capital) who were there to engage in various pursuits, including a circus-like football game, good music, and good food. Apparently they slaughtered 4,200 prime North Carolina chickens to feed the lot.

Look out in the middle of January, when the 38 Tarheels from Chapel Hill come to raise hell in Toronto.

GOVERNING COUNCIL MEETING NOVEMBER 22ND, 1973

The Executive Committee of the Governing Council has advised that on November 22nd, 1973, the Governing Council will commence its deliberations at 4.00 p.m. rather than 4.30 p.m. The initial business will be the budget recommendations for 1974-75, and this item will be considered in camera.

The other two major items of business, Food Sciences and the Disciplinary Structures and Procedures, will be dealt with in that order later in the meeting, and present estimates suggest that the meeting will move into open session at about 5.00 p.m.

Tickets for this meeting of the Governing Council will be available at the Information Desk, main foyer, Simcoe Hall, on the day of the meeting, and it is expected that ticket holders will be admitted to the meeting following consideration of the budget recommendations. At the time of consideration of the Structures and Procedures for Discipline observers without tickets may be admitted to the places vacated by ticket holders who may have come to hear the earlier agenda items only.

U of T stalls on discrimination against women

By ANNE HEALY

The problem of discrimination against female non-academic staff has met with little action at Simcoe Hall. The investigation to check the factual information relating to the complaint received from the women was initiated last May by Internal Affairs vice president Jill Conway and Gwen Russell, but still no definite action has taken place.

An October 3 report to the Business Affairs Committee by Conway and Russell defined problem areas.

A confidential questionnaire sent to all full-time female non-academic staff in May asking reactions to hiring and promotional policies. The subsequent interviews in July revealed many injustices.

The primary problem is the limited opportunity for "career development" for women, who tend to start out in the lower positions, the report says.

In the three highest salary groups in the classified positions there are 109 men and four women. Within the administrative assistant series, there are 37 women and 12 men at the lowest level and 24 men and 12 women at the second level.

Another complaint in the report states: "The classification descriptions are written in a manner which does not take into account the exercise of responsibility on the part of women non-academic staff... The actual responsibilities performed by a departmental secretary in preparing budgets and making major administrative decisions regarding departmental affairs do not enter into the description of her job since these responsibilities are automatically assigned to her male superior."

At the business affairs committee meeting the committee agreed a joint sub-committee of business affairs and internal affairs should be appointed to consider the issues and recommend changes.

The committee requested that Conway, Rankin, Russell and a resource person should meet meanwhile "to formulate more specific recommendations in regard to the policy issues" and bring them to the December 4 Business Affairs meeting.

Now, one and half months later, little progress will occur until the appointment of three persons from each of the Business Affairs and Internal Affairs to expand the sub-committee consisting now of Conway, Rankin, and Russell.

Conway and Russell also must succeed in getting the release of confidentiality from the concerned employees before their problems can be dealt with.

Rankin said: "We must take positive action and come to some conclusion," but few seemed to know when that would happen.

Simon Fraser reports Trudeau to leave politics become university president

BURNABY (CUP) — In its efforts to get a "superstar" to take over from Simon Fraser University administration president Kenneth Strand when he retires next September, the university's presidential search committee may have found its Bobby Hull in Pierre Trudeau.

According to the Simon Fraser student newspaper, The Peak, two of the three people being considered in the committee's "superstar" category are former Canadian cabinet minister Eric Kierans and American economist John Kenneth Galbraith, although neither has expressed interest in the job.

But The Peak said Friday another "superstar" has submitted an application and has the best chance of getting the job.

The student newspaper reported that Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau will be the next Simon Fraser administration president.

Trudeau, who reportedly submitted an application just before nominations closed last week, will apparently retire from politics because some of his cabinet and some Liberal riding associations do not think he can win another election.

The Peak said John Wheatley, Simon Fraser's dean of graduate studies, has been in contact with Ottawa during the past few months and Strand talked to Trudeau in Ottawa recently.

The presidential search committee has apparently been sworn to secrecy in the presence of RCMP officials. The Peak said it got its information from a "usually reliable source." Frank Rotering, editor of The Peak, said he is "99 per cent sure" his information is correct.

Trudeau's cabinet held a special meeting this weekend, apparently to discuss legislation for the current parliamentary session and possible topics for the Liberal convention.

A CBC news report Friday said that Minister of Agriculture Eugene Whelan had been called back from a conference in Rome to attend the meeting. But an official in Trudeau's office said that Whelan's return was not specifically for this meeting.

All cabinet ministers except External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp attended the meeting.

Rumors of Trudeau's impending resignation have been circulating in Ottawa in the last few weeks. According to Claude Belloune in the November issue of Last Post magazine:

"The bourgeois French-Canadian grapevine in Montreal is circulating a rather interesting story concerning Pierre Elliot Trudeau.

"This grapevine, which is Trudeau's milieu, says that the prime minister intends to resign shortly, possibly at the end of November, and 'return home' to academic life."

But a source close to the Trudeau cabinet said rumors of his resignation were "nonsense. He has just begun some programs he'll stay to finish." Other sources contend the lack of confidence in Trudeau's leadership, growing economic problems, and the lack of a cohesive Liberal energy policy will be enough to force Trudeau's resignation.

Many people said they were skeptical of the stated reasons for this weekend's special cabinet meeting.

One source said Margaret Trudeau owns a house in Vancouver (her family lives there) and has been buying household effects in Ottawa in the past few weeks.

The Simon Fraser presidential search committee will probably make its final decision next spring. There are four students on the 16-member committee.

Would you give a used university to this man?

French tightenings bring student response

By MARINA STRAUSS

Proposals by the combined French department to tighten up requirements for specialization are arousing a ripple of response from an often silent sea of French students.

The departmental proposals run contrary to the flexibility in the Arts and Science Faculty New Program, and include increasing the number of courses required for specialization to 12 from 10 and for co-specialization to eight from seven.

The proposals would make a senior essay or some independent work obligatory in fourth year, as well as put stringent regulations in the form of pre-requisites on upper-level courses.

The New Program, instituted in 1969, was designed to allow students freer rein in choosing their courses by loosening specialization requirements.

The recommendations must be approved by the combined department's general committee, a 180-member body with 30 students and 150 teaching staff.

The general committee, which has final say in all matters concerning courses, is to begin discussion of the proposals at its next meeting, which has not yet been scheduled.

A cross-campus French student union has recently been formed to deal with such issues as the department's proposals. All students on the department's committee are also members of the union.

Three weeks ago only 18 of the 30 students seats on the faculty-dominated body were filled, 12 from University and eight from Victoria Colleges.

In an all-out effort to inform students of the department's structure, the newly-born union filled all student positions, recruiting eight reps from St. Michael's College, two from UC and two from VIC. Trinity College, however, remains silent.

"The department's proposals run directly contrary to the principles of the New Program" one student claimed at least week's second union organizational meeting.

Many of the more than 30 students at the meeting also voiced their disapproval of the department's specialist examination, which must be passed in addition to regular courses in order to specialize in French and enter graduate school. No other language department requires such an exam.

"The exam is the only way they have to standardize the levels across campus," UC union rep Christine Sinclair explained. "But it penalizes persons who can't write a good exam, and asks them in two or three hours to synthesize three or four years of work."

Sinclair added 60 per cent of those who wrote the specialist exam last year failed it. However, combined department chairman E. A. Walker claimed this figure is "exaggerated".

At the union's first organizational meeting, one student complained of the need for more translation courses. This year there was room for only 24 of the 56 students who applied for the newly instituted translation course.

"This shows how isolated the decisions that are being made are, that no one knew how many students could be expected for such a course" a student commented.

Due to the scarcity of teaching positions for graduates, many French students hope to direct their studies elsewhere. Translation skills could be very helpful in finding a job.

Students at the meeting wanted to see varied courses in the French department dealing with such areas as history and political science to provide a perspective for literary works. Students suggested joint courses with other departments could be instituted into the French program.

Another topic which the union will be looking into is more depth in president John Evans' proposal for department centralization for "college" courses such as French.

This recommendation would allow professors to be cross-appointed between colleges and would reduce overlapping of courses offered.

"Students should have a free choice of any French course offered anywhere at the university," argued one student.

The union is to meet Thursday at 4 pm to discuss its position on the proposals for specialization requirements.

Greek students revolt: 100 dead

More than 100 students died and hundreds more were injured last Friday as the Greek government stormed Athens's Polytechnic Institute with tanks and troops.

The government move was one of the last it needed to put down an uprising against the military junta — an uprising begun by students less than a week ago.

The last words beamed from the student-installed radio station inside the occupied school said:

"We are unarmed. We are the youth of Greece. We are against the tanks, the agents of the US."

Moments later the building — occupied by more than 10,000 students since November 13 — was attacked in a battle which lasted more than eight hours.

By Saturday morning martial law was re-imposed in Greece, and in Athens, Salonic and Patras a state of siege was declared. But renewed demonstrations continued on through Sunday in Athens.

Shortly after students began their occupation, their transmitter beamed appeals to the population to begin the resistance. Hours later about 15,000 were fighting police in Athens.

In every major city in Greece the government arrested hundreds, and major battles were reported in the telecommunications headquarters in Athens, the justice ministry and offices of the governor of Attica.

The student radio continued broadcasting throughout the fighting and issued an appeal to all foreign governments and the International Red Cross for help to transport more than a thousand injured during the uprising to the grounds of the institute.

With government forces now back in control, the injured are believed to have been taken to one of Athens's stadiums, where blood supply is dangerously low.

Late reports from Athens indicate they are with about 25,000 others in military camps and concentration areas.

James Bay fiasco gains a reprieve

The recent decision of the Mr. Justice Albert Malouf of the Quebec Superior court to grant the native peoples in the James Bay area an injunction against any further development of the area comes as a hollow victory.

Although sanity has prevailed, much of the irreparable harm has already been done. The groundwork has, in effect, been laid for further economic rape and plunder of the area affecting one-fifth of the province of Quebec and 6,000 native people — both Indian and Eskimo.

Malouf ruled that the Indians and Eskimos have rights to the land, that the province must negotiate the surrender of these rights before developing the area and that the project will have a disastrous effect on the area's environment. In doing so he stopped what inevitably could have almost disastrously affected the environment of not only Quebec but much of the rest of Eastern Canada.

And it was also bitterly ironic to read a quote in the daily papers from one of the James Bay Development Corporation spokesmen that workers on the job deserved some sort of slow down period before being totally laid off. As he put it, "You don't just tell these men, six weeks before Christmas that they have no jobs. As human beings, they deserve more of an explanation than that and this is what we are trying to give them."

But as one might expect the native peoples in the area were never given any such consideration — their land was merely expropriated in defiance of all existing evidence or logic. But such is the state of affairs in Quebec today where over half the population has just re-elected an opportunistic and corruption-dominated Liberal government.

Although sanity may have prevailed, it has only come after $200 million has so far been spent on the James Bay project, as well as untold psychological costs to the native peoples of the province — to say nothing about the hatred engendered by the careless and arrogant expropriation of territory.

The recent court decision should give us all cause to reflect on the extent to which callous, self-interested men like

Robert Bourassa can have their own way at the public expense. And as Keith Dewar pointed out in a recent Varsity feature the James Bay project was announced before a major environmental study had been carried out on the area — only after the go-ahead decision was made did the Quebec government see fit to rush through a fast study on the implications of the project.

James Bay is a wonder of "technological times" — it never should have happened. There were never any convincing arguments — at least from the public's point of view — that would have made usually rationally men proceed with the development scheme.

The project was announced with no consideration at all for social cost. The federal government did not have the courage, much less the convictions to put a stop to the project even though such an order might have been handed down through Indian Affairs minister Jean Chretien's department.

As the recent revelations in the released secret Indian papers, Chretien and the federal government are closer to the corporate lies that bind them to the Quebec social strata than they are to that undefinable term "the grass roots".

Even this past weekend Chretien was meeting with Indian leaders to discuss the situation and was at the same time holding discussion periods with Robert Bourassa. Chretien is reportedly favouring an out-of-court settlement with the Indians for the land, but an in court fight would probably prove extremely embarrassing politically for him and his federal and provincial friends.

People in Ontario should express their concern for the rights of Quebec's native peoples and not allow Bourassa's appeal against the injunction to win.

Public pressure can be exerted in the next few months to bring the costly and wasteful James Bay project to a complete and permanent halt. The failure of the job creation scheme of James Bay will reveal to the Quebec people that in the last election they didn't elect a party but only bought a one-way ticket to further disaster.

U of T personnel dept obstructs GAA

As two of today's page one stories indicate, teaching assistants across the country are finally organizing into a coherent union to press for some decent working conditions. Unfortunately, at the University of Toronto they are being obstructed from effectively organizing because of technical rules and bureaucratic obstinence.

For example, Michael O'Keefe, president of the Graduate Assistants Association wrote a letter October 22 to R.F. Brown, personnel director for the university asking him for a list of all graduate assistants at the University of Toronto. And he was careful to define what he meant by teaching assistants at this university—a definition so inclusive that it would be easily understood.

As O'Keefe pointed out in the letter, "in a normal management/labor situation this request would be rather unusual, to say the least. But," he continued "we think that both sides are interested in determining the real wishes of the Graduate Assistants with regard to unionization."

Apparently he's wrong. It's now November 19 and neither

O'Keefe nor any other member of the GAA has received the requested list. The administration may have lost it in its "correspondence machinery" but that would seem unlikely when faced with some of the recommendations contained in the Foster Task Force on Academic Appointments.

As some students and members of the university community might recall, one of the key objectives of the task force was to define where costs could be cut in the academic realm in view of the fact that enrolment was reaching a steady state at the University of Toronto.

It seems somewhat logical that the administration would, therefore, want to discourage any attempt for any organization on the campus to become strong enough to organize for the purpose of higher wages and working benefits.

As O'Keefe points out in the page one article, wages for teaching assistants at this university range from $500 to $1,000 and that's often for the same amount of work. Also important is the fact that teaching assistants do more than 40 per cent of the undergraduate teaching at this university and yet receive only a small fraction of the wages of the tenure professor.

The existing system smacks strongly of the apprentice pattern so common in the middle ages with the guild mentality—obviously it still remains at this university.

But perhaps we've been too harsh. Maybe the university would like to see its teaching assistants receive a living wage similar to the guaranteed $2,400 granted to the already-formed University of Windsor association. But then again maybe not.

If personnel director Brown hasn't yet had O'Keefe's letter cross his desk we would like to suggest that he check his files, or, failing that, take this editorial as an open request to submit a list of all graduate assistants working at the university to the Graduate Assistants Association. Such an action might begin to dispel some of the negative rumours going around that the university administration "doesn't play fair" and that it "bargains in bad faith with its workers."

How about it Mr. Brown?

Athletics report refreshing

Today's centre-spread feature takes a look at one of the most significant in a long line of athletic reports to come from this university.

Researched by Bruce Kidd and Brian Levitt during the summer months the report should be criticized for the undemocratic manner in which it made its decisions.

However, despite that criticism, we find there is little we can disagree with in the task force proposals.

But we do have a couple of questions.

Where is the money to build the facilities going to come from and, what guarantee is there that the needs of the majority of students, community members, faculty, support staff, and teaching staff will be met before the administration begins to push for the development of "world class" athletes? Or are the two objectives so synonymous that they can both be accomplished simultaneously.

Which brings us back to the question of money. We would not like to see students pay further for athletic facilities when they have put considerable sums of money over the past 60 years toward athletic facilities on the St. George Campus. It's time for a long-negligent university administration to do its part.

We also oppose the task force's proposal to place an athletic field house in the Glen Morris-Harbord block of land, even at the expense of facility space if facilities had to be located elsewhere. And the Robert Street field should be left as it is. Any attempts to locate an Olympic size ice surface on such a field would only reflect the university's continuing preoccupation with the development of its own presumptuous "grandeur".

Varsity reviled for criticism

In response to The Varsity's Friday November 16 editorial "Toke Confrontation only divides students", we'd like to make the following points.

Firstly, when a gaggle of fools from the Engineering Society (who, no doubt, do not represent all engineering students) seek to disrupt a protest against the racist and sexist newspaper Toke Oike, the pompous Varsity editors, posturing as the incarnation of principled politics, seem more inclined to criticize the left elements initiating the anti-racist protest (in this case, the SDA supported by the RMG), rather than the initiators of the violence who sympathize with the political garbage of the Toke.

According to The Varsity, the left is just as responsible as the right for the violent occurrences last Wednesday. The fact that it was the engineers who shouted down speakers, threw helmet-fulls of water at demonstrators, and pushed, punched, tripped, and kicked some of us (to the extent that one of our members received a lacerated knee, requiring stitches) stands in no account to the pacifist editors of The Varsity. The latter are more concerned that the students not be divided while there's a discipline code to fight, for after all, the phillistine parochialists argue, "racism will be around" next week — which brings us to our second point.

We find it hard to take comfort in the knowledge that racism will be around next week. Like the discipline code, or the police violence at the Artistic Woodworking picket lines, or Canada's complicity in the militarist coup in Chile, racism has to be fought every day — not just when the radical-chic declare it to be the "in" thing to do. And if it divides students — so, who's surprised? All the ideological and material divisions in class society are reflected in the student milieu. It is to be utopian and dishonest to think that these divisions can be papered over by editorial posturing, or any other means. And it is unprincipled to seek to do so. Reactionary tendencies that appear in any strata of the population must be confronted by any means necessary. The threat that they pose, is always a serious one, especially for minorities and advocates of social change. A study of history will teach this much to The Varsity heads.

As revolutionary marxists, we stand for "no platform for fascists and racists," and will defend that view in practice at all times. The least the "pink" Varsity can do is to refrain from its sundry school sermons, if it deigns not to educate students about the need to combat racism on campus.

Racism most vital issue on campus

Although not an SDS member, I strongly supported their anti-racist demonstration in front of Simcoe Hall. The turnout of 40-50 racist engineers shouting out comments like "Hitler should have gotten all the Jews" and "It's right to pay Italians lower wages" in response to points raised by speakers, only proved the point that apparently harmless cartoons create a climate of racism.

With poor employment prospects for minority group students, increasing difficulties for foreign students to get into U of T (according to U of T's submission to the Committee on University Affairs), U of T's employment of Dr. Hector, a racist firing recently of a black worker at U of T's Sunnybrook Hospital, racism is a real problem at this university.

With a probable depression, or at least a recession, on the way, the need to fight racism takes on added urgency. Historically depressions have seen a strong promotion of racism by those in power. Beyond the need for a scapegoat, racism is pushed because of the way it divides workers, (preventing them from fighting back against bad working conditions) and because it allows for wage stratification to maximise profits.

These economic effects combined with the emotional destruction and alienation which racism brings, makes it probably the most vital issue to be fought on campus. What is particularly disturbing is the way various campus spokespeople have downplayed and even abetted racism at U of T. The administration allowed some engineers to get onto the Simcoe Hall roof to throw things down on the demo in their attempt to break it up.

Bob Anderson, again forgetting that he was elected to provide leadership, characteristically refused to take a public stand on Toke racism, fearful of alienating certain racist engineers. If he took his role as a student leader seriously, instead of opportunistically, he would realize that the point is to work towards a more humane university, and join with the many engineering students who abhor Toke racism in demanding that it not be continued. The Varsity sectarianly denounced the demonstration because the discipline campaign is also being waged and it is the "major issue" of the day. The suggestion that fighting racism is of so little importance that it should be forgotten whenever a new issue arises, is disgusting. It seems, given The Varsity's lack of coverage of the problem of racism at U of T, that this is in fact their position.

You don't have to be in the Italian Student's Union, Hillel or SDS to deplore racism, just responsibly.

Howard Gavit
Student Governor

Don't postpone racism fight

In Friday's Varsity the RMG and the SDS were criticized for a demonstration against racism in the Toke Oike. The writer of the editorial put the blame on these groups for dividing students when they should be united against the discipline code and implied that the fight against racism can wait because it will be around for a long time. While agreeing with some of the Varsity's criticisms of the tactics of the two groups, we disagree with the view that the fight against racism is divisive and should be postponed. Instead we feel that the real blame for dividing arts and engineering students should be placed where it belongs: on the shoulders of the present editors of the Toke Oike.

The Toke this year has done nothing to encourage the participation of engineering students around such issues as the discipline code but instead has served as a vehicle for the personal sexist, racist and anti-humanist views of the present editors. These individuals are exploiting the tradition of the paper as a "humorous" extension of the LGMB as a cover for their own extremely reactionary views. Since September the Toke has ridiculed the struggle for basic rights of the United Farmworkers. It has published articles denouncing the struggle for democracy in Chile. Recent Toke material is not new to the city. For example, a picture of Karl Marx captioned "wanted for murder" was originally posted around town a year or so ago by the fascist Western Guard, whose racist views are more and more being echoed in the Toke. Instead of confining its editorial to a denunciation of SDS and RMG tactics, we feel that The Varsity could have pointed out that the present Toke Oike does not represent the interests of the majority of the engineers which in fact are the same as all students at the U of T.

The Varsity editorial is incorrect in assuming that the struggle against campus racism and the struggle against the discipline code are unrelated. The reactionary views expressed in the Toke Oike stand in the way (and are intended to stand in the way) of building a united student movement against the discipline code and other campus issues. We are those engineers who do not support the neo-fascist writers of the Toke to come forward and demand that their paper represent the interests and opinions of the majority of engineering students.

Dove catches us with red faces

I would like to correct several substantial errors in your article of November 12, about the meeting of the Academic Affairs committee on November 6.

• You quote me as criticizing a letter from Dean W. S. Rogers of Trinity College. The quoted remarks are not made by me, nor are the quoted opinions mine. Some remarks about the Trinity letter were however made by another member of the Committee.

• Your article states, quite incorrectly, that the information about grading was labelled "information only", meaning "no vote". It was not so labelled. Moreover you wrongly give the impression that the Committee was indifferent to the problems discussed and that nothing further is being done. In fact the Committee referred the whole matter to its standing Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards for detailed consideration and evaluation. When the Subcommittee's report comes forward, the Academic Affairs committee will take these matters up again. If the Committee decides then that action is called for, I have no doubt that action will be taken. Incidentally, as you will know, the Academic Affairs committee is at present very busy with the Report of the Forster Task Force, so that by referring the grading problem to the Subcommittee we will in fact speed up detailed consideration both of grading and of the task force report.

• Your reporter says that not all faculties submitted reports. He apparently did not know that to reduce expense, only a representative sample of copies of reports was distributed to the members of the committee. The complete set of data from faculties is several inches thick. This complete set is, of course, being made available to the members of our Subcommittee, and it will also go to the members of the Academic Affairs committee itself, if necessary, when the Subcommittee's report comes forward.

In conclusion I would like to point out that while some of the grading discrepancies which were discussed appear to be caused by real concern, such problems cannot be eliminated by a simple change in the rules. I am sure that most of your readers would be quite unhappy if, for example, some of the discrepancies were removed by arbitrarily legislating that regardless of the abilities or achievements of the students in a course, only a certain fixed proportion of those students would receive "A's".

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL AN ANNOUNCEMENT

The Chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee, after consultation with the Chairman of the Academic Affairs Committee, announced today that she would recommend to the Governing Council that there be no vote taken on the Discipline Proposals and Procedures at the Thursday, November 22nd Governing Council meeting, so that there would be opportunity for further debate. She also pointed out that both the Internal Affairs Committee and the Academic Affairs Committee have continuing responsibilities to monitor the implementation and to recommend changes to the Code and Structures as they are deemed appropriate. To this end, the Committees will continue to receive and consider all responsible suggestions for amendments. The Chairman of Internal Affairs stressed that there would be a lengthy stage between approval of the Discipline Structures and Procedures and actual implementation of the Code and that all interested groups would have opportunities for comment on substantive issues during the period required to set up the proposed discipline structures. Fem's hockey: four in a row

By LYNDA HARLEY

The women's intercollegiate ice hockey team started off the season with a rush, winning four in a row to equal the men's record.

Last weekend they captured the York Invitational title with three straight.

In the opening round they defeated Loyola 3-1 on goals by Cathy Stead, Margi Goldsmith and Lynda Harley, with Louise Attallah contributing excellent goaltending. Angela Colm and Harley scored in a 2-1 victory that sent the Blues into the final against Seneca.

Playing without veteran defencemen Nancy Missouri and Mary Griffin, they had their work cut out. The changes had little effect on the result, a 6-3 win. On Thursday the team met Guelph in the regular season opener for a 6-3 win.

McGill warns union

MONTREAL (CUP) — Union solicitation during working hours is illegal, according to a memorandum sent to the McGill University library staff recently.

The memorandum quotes chapter 11, section 5 of the Quebec Labour Code: "no person, in the name or on behalf of an association of employees, shall, during working hours, solicit an employee to join an association."

According to library director Richard Farley, the memorandum was issued from the personnel office in response to staff requests that the law governing unionizing activities be clarified.

Larry Feldman, a library employee, said that the memorandum was issued soon after a brochure was circulated by union organizers explaining the ideas behind unionization.

He said the memorandum was "probably an attempt to stifle discussion by not clearly explaining what solicitation means."

Mike Cohen, of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), said that the solicitation article in the labour code is "one of the most difficult articles to interpret." "People have a right to talk," he said, "signing a card during work hours is another matter."

Feldman disagreed with Farley's contention that the memorandum was an attempt to clarify issues.

"If they had wanted to clarify matters they wouldn't have just anted one of the few sections in the labour code which supports the employer; they would have included a parts that protect the union organizers. They must have printed a part about no solicitation during working hours for a particular reason."

When asked if the administration would prosecute persons believed violating the solicitation law, Farley said that the employee would be the one to report any problem to the proper authorities. He said that "a lot of people don't understand about unions."

According to Farley, the memorandum was designed to tell employees "what recourse of action they have."

Farley had no comment concerning unionization beyond saying, "it's up to each individual." In response to a question about whether efforts to unionize have hampered library work, Farley said, "no comment."

New grading policy?

By MARGARET ROBERTSON

At Wednesday's meeting, the Academic Affairs subcommittee on curriculum and standards is to begin work on the problem of standardizing grades.

At its first two meetings this fall, the sub-committee re-organized. Last year, said Frans DeBruyn, a University College undergraduate who also sat on the committee then, the sub-committee degenerated into "rubber stamp" for Academic Affairs spending much time "simply going through the calendar, making changes."

This year, with their own new guidelines, the sub-committee hopes to be more productive. The members decided instead of approving all course changes, the faculties will be required to present only major alterations.

Such things as content of new courses, reasons for discontinuing old ones and examination schedules will be submitted for approval.

Minor changes, such as re-scheduling of class hours will no longer come before the committee, leaving more time for policy making.

Standardization of grades will be a major project. The members do not expect to accomplish a great deal before January, but, so that positive action may be taken before the end of the academic year, a report is to be submitted to Academic Affairs for its appraisal hopefully by March, DeBruyn said.

The number of students on the curriculum and standards subcommittee has been increased to six and they intend to ensure that courses presented to them "meet educational requirements," said Norman Everich, an undergraduate from the Faculty of Medicine.

The committee's main aim this year, he said, will be to "uphold the educational standard."

Bourassa must deal with native people

By DAVID EDMONDS

Robert Bourassa will "lose his shirt" if he fails to negotiate with the Indians of the James Bay area, says Gordon Lee of the Canadian Association in Support of Native Peoples.

Lee was reacting to the decision handed down Thursday by Quebec Superior Court Judge Albert Malouf, who ordered an immediate halt to construction of the multi-billion dollar hydro project.

Last December, the Indians of Quebec Association filed suit for an interlocutory injunction to halt the project, pending the investigation of native rights claims. The hearings ended in June, and there was a further five-month delay before the ruling was handed down.

The court judgement halting construction coincides with the cessation of work on the project for the winter.

Lee feels it is impossible for Bourassa to ignore the case of the Indians. If the case goes to the Supreme Court of Canada, the project may have to be cancelled if the native rights position stands.

The strength of the native rights case can best be measured by the position of the federal government. The federal government advised the unsundered rights of the native peoples constituted title to the land, and that it would be liable for failing to intervene actively on their behalf.

Documents stolen from the department of Indian affairs in Ottawa indicated the federal government was indeed prepared to intervene actively on behalf of the Indians, but it bowed to pressure from Bourassa.

In announcing the James Bay project, Bourassa effectively broke off negotiations between Quebec native peoples and government which had been taking place concerning unsundered native rights.

The project was announced prior to any consultation between native peoples and government on its effect. Not a single environmental impact study was made before the decision to proceed was announced.

The depth of the gulf between the native peoples and Bourassa is illustrated in a story told by Chief Billy Diamond, leader of the campaign against the project.

When Diamond's delegation of native peoples made their first representation to Bourassa, he told them he would only give them five minutes of his time.

He said he had sacrificed his lunch break on their behalf and was due at a cabinet meeting.

During the presentation, which was in Cree, Bourassa spent the whole time talking to one of his aides in French, not having arranged for a translator.

Deep Throat slashed again

The movie Deep Throat, and two others have resulted in charges being laid against the director of the Rochdale College Cinema Archives.

A police raid at the Dovercourt residence of Reg Hartt early Friday resulted in the confiscation of the movies Deep Throat, Boys in the Sand and Bijou.

The three movies had been shown in the Rochdale Cinema which Hartt says is a club which requires membership before a person may be admitted to see a movie.

Hartt is scheduled to appear in court November 29 on a charge of possession of obscene material for distribution in connection with the films.

An unrelated showing of the film Deep Throat, on October 11 resulted in a police raid at the Medical Science Auditorium and three U of T students charged with exposing an obscene movie to public view.

The students' trial date is scheduled to be set November 27, and a defence attorney indicated the trial will likely occur sometime in January or February.

Court re-writes law

The turning point in the abortion trial of Dr. Henry Morgentaler did not come with Tuesday's not guilty finding by the jury, but Monday when Associate Chief Justice James Huggess ruled an obscure point of law would be allowed for the defence.

That ruling, according to Crown attorney Louis Robichaud, "has legalized abortion on demand." He said: "It's a victory for the judge, not for the defence."

Article 45 states that a doctor is had never been used as a defence in an abortion charge before the Morgentaler case.

It is frequently used in cases of criminal negligence, such as a doctor performing an emergency operation on an auto accident victim.

Article 45 states that a doctor is protected from criminal prosecution if:

"The operation is performed with reasonable care and skill, and;

"It is reasonable to perform the operation, having regard to the state of health of the person at the time of the operation is performed and to all the circumstances of the case."

The Crown has already announced its intention to appeal the successful use of this clause in protecting Morgentaler. Such an appeal could ultimately wind up before the Supreme Court of Canada for a final ruling.

If the Supreme Court were to uphold Justice Huggess's ruling, any doctor in Canada charged with performing an abortion under Article 251 of the Criminal Code—as Morgentaler was charged—would have a defence and would win.

Such a ruling would also have political repercussions as pro-abortion groups would have won, in effect, what Robichaud called "abortion on demand," and anti-abortion groups would be the groups having to protest to try to get Parliament to change the law.

The Morgentaler case also presented a relative rarity in Canadian jurisprudence—a court writing new law. In effect, if the use of Article 45 is upheld on appeal, it would render the restrictions against abortions in Article 251 useless and reverse the intent of Article 251.

Generally it is the function of Parliament to delete from or add to laws in Canada, although Parliament at any time could amend Article 251 to prevent the use of Article 45 as a defence.

Prior to the Morgentaler case abortions were only allowed if the woman's life or well-being were in danger, and the abortion also had to be approved by a three-member hospital board set up to judge abortion applications.

During the trial, Morgentaler never denied he had given an abortion to the Crown's 26-year-old witness. Instead he admitted that abortion and that he has performed more than 6,000 abortions in his Montreal clinic.

The point of law which won his case with the Court of Queen's Bench jury of 11 men and one woman was carefully built up during the trial and summed up after all evidence was in by defence council Claude Armand Sheppard.

In his final summary to the jury Sheppard argued the woman was justified in getting the operation based on Morgentaler's assessment of her physical and mental health.

After all the Crown and defence evidence and summations were presented to the jury, Justice Huggess had to make the critical decision on whether to allow Article 45.

He did, and when he gave his charge to the jury—instructing them on how to consider the case—he said there were four main elements in the case:

- was it a surgical operation?
- was it performed with reasonable care and skill?

• was it reasonable to perform it, having regard to the state of the health of the patient at the time and to all of the circumstances of the case?

During the trial, the defence had introduced evidence that the abortion was an operation and that Morgentaler was a competent physician.

The defence also had called numerous witnesses to testify whether the respective experts felt the operation was "reasonable" considering the circumstances the woman was in at time she had the abortion.

Those defence witnesses testified they would have recommended an abortion for the immigrant woman because of her acute psychological, social and economic problems.

Film gets response

By HEATHER SANGUINS

La Vie Revee (Dream Life), a full-length colour film shown at OCE Wednesday, dealt with the gutsy realities like women's sexual phantasy life, and earning a living in a male-structured world.

In one scene the younger of the two heroines is fired from her job at a movie studio because of staff cut-backs, and her boss reassures her that there is nothing to worry about because she'll "have no trouble getting a husband."

The predominantly female audience reacted to this by laughter and hisses.

The plot of the movie was how a woman, with the help of a woman friend plans to become pregnant by a macho-type "older" man whom she has idealized right out of reality.

The women plan to raise the resulting progeny. However when the "hero" and the woman get together the results are nonexistent.

Subsequently the previously infatuated woman confides to her friend: "you were right, he was a fake."

One male character was the other woman's lover who claimed that "sexual repression causes insanity", and consequently tries to liberate both women.

The "hero" was a married father whose profession was directing pornographic movies at the studio where both women worked and also where they met.

The French-Canadian families of both of the women were presented too.

The younger woman was from an average, one-servant, middle-class home. Her mother was a well-dressed socialite, father a businessman.

The older woman came from a typical, working class milieu: her mother was quiet and overworked, her father had been dead since she was twelve and her brother was a separatist.

One of the most unique and interesting aspects of this film was the absence of the usual romantic paraphernalia like flowers and bells-in-the-air.

The movie was produced by the Montreal Film Co-op. Set in Montreal, the dialogue was in French with English subtitles. In the film, though, there were often scenes, for instance dream sequences, with little dialogue. This absence served to heighten the effectiveness of the imaginative film ideas then in play.

Pagan not yet free

Once again a Canadian court has ruled there are no grounds for the United States to extradite Humberto Pagan Hernandez on a murder charge, and once again it is unclear how much longer the legal battle will continue.

The US has been trying to get Pagan back for two years, alleging he was responsible for the death of the head of the San Juan, Puerto Rico, riot squad in a March, 1971 clash between police and supporters of the US's independence movement.

This time, it was the Federal Court of Appeals which upheld a county court ruling that there were no grounds for an extradition. The Canada-US extradition treaty provides the foreign government must establish a prima facie case before an extradition order can be made.

The unanimous Federal Court ruling says, in effect, the US did not establish a prima facie case during the county court hearing which ended in June, 1972.

The US could appeal the case to the Supreme Court of Canada, but the high court would be limited to reviewing the lower court decision.

That move is being held for a month and negotiations between Pagan's lawyer, the Canadian Immigration department and the Puerto Rican government for a resolution could take place in the meantime.

The situation is complicated by a deportation order against Pagan made by the immigration Appeal Board, but an appeal against that order to the Federal Court of Appeals is being held pending resolution of the extradition case.

Pagan entered Canada under an assumed name in 1971 and was arrested by the RCMP which led to the deportation order. He is now working in Montreal.

The Federal Court decision turning down the US extradition appeal was a first for a foreign government. No other government had appealed an extradition case.

Athletic report has few faults but community fights expansion

By BOB GAUTHIER

The hastily-formulated yet remarkably well-researched Report of the Task Force on New Athletics Facilities on the St. George Campus, leaves several questions unanswered and certain campus-related groups confused.

Researched over the summer by newly-arrived faculty member Bruce Kidd and by Brian Levitt, former Special Assistant to vice-president and provost Don Forster, the report has failed to define any "priority of implementation" policies, although it has singled out priorities. The task force has, instead, left the decision-making up to the Internal Affairs committee of the Governing Council.

The report also fails to mention the financial base for planned athletic facilities and what they will be devoted to, given the already-limited financial resources of the administration for athletic facilities, programs and educational improvement. However, the present task force—the fourth of its kind since 1963—is the most detailed yet, once again raising previously frustrated expectations that some progress will indeed now be made.

"Policy Objectives" elaborated

The task force report, signed by Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway, Governing Council alumnus member Gus Abols, and three administrators connected with athletics, contains no direct input from the student body. This is the report's first major fault. No students worked on the task force over the summer.

Apparently the Internal Affairs committee decided last spring to "pull out all stops" to have a major, detailed report ready to go to the Governing Council this fall, and Kidd and Levitt attempted to gather information from various campus groups during the summer, when most students were unavailable for comment.

Conway replied to accusations concerning the illegitimacy and non-representativity of the document with the statement: "It's only a working document". However, working documents at the University of Toronto have a habit of becoming slightly-modified, "de facto" policies.

Without directly indicating which areas of the stated "policy objectives" are to be emphasized the task force report lists seven broad policies. (Kidd himself has admitted that he would hope the order of the listing would indicate the order of priority.)

Topping the list is the academic role of the university and "the discipline of physical education". The objectives in this area are "to facilitate scholarly research in physical education" and to teach professional physical educators and community sports leaders in "the sport sciences; man and leisure; health studies; sport, dance, exercise and play as human phenomena; and physical education in general."

Seemingly omitted from the list is any emphasis on a critical look at sport and the part it plays in relation to our society as a whole. Although Kidd himself last year taught a course on the "Political Economy of Sport" through the School of Physical and Health Education, there is little indication given through the words of the task force that the desired academic program will be little else but an attempt to mirror the present liberal-democratic structure and, consequently, its mystifications and misleading characteristics. A more detailed listing of the course structures is of no further help.

In sum, the lack of a critical, along with a resource program, would appear to be a contradiction of one of the recently formulated "General Objectives of the University of Toronto" which states that "the teaching and research function of the university 'implies also involvement with society in the dual role of critic and resource.'"

Second on the task force's list is "athletic instruction, competition, and recreation". The section emphasizes the importance for members of the university community of having the occasion for spontaneous play and competition as well as the "benefit of professional instruction in learning the skills and rules of the sports they play, especially the 'carry-over' sports students will pursue beyond graduation".

The task force shows a desired rate of participation of 60 per cent of full time students where presently only 26 per cent are involved (as opposed to 68 per cent at Queen's University). But, as the task force later reveals, the cost for the attainment of such a goal is high, and no decision on the construction of adequate facilities has yet been made.

A third important aspect emphasized by the task force is "physical fitness". The document states that "this responsibility has long been neglected by the university despite the great need for fitness programs", and indicates its desire for a program "to contribute to the continuing physical well-being of members of the university community by providing programs that stress the provide for empirical research into the requirements of excellence in these sports."

The task force report singles out four sport areas — ice hockey, aquatics, gymnastics, track and field—as "first priority" sports without adequately explaining how this decision was arrived at and on what basis—this failure is the second main fault of the report.

Perhaps the priorities are just, but there is little explanation other than tradition given to support them. The report briefly elaborates the university's "history of excellence" in most "of these first priority" sports, but makes no attempt to indicate why other outstanding sports, such as badminton, tennis, or volleyball, were not chosen instead of the indicated four sports.

Also, the task force appears to have not questioned closely enough whether the university is the appropriate institution in our society for the training of such "world class athletes", and it fails, once again, to indicate what kind of resources and manpower this objective will take away from other more mass-oriented objectives (given the U

A recent memorandum from vice-president Conway, on the needed financial support, stated: "Federal funding would be provided that there was developed for community was a clear orientation for participation and the fitness."

There is also some "world-class athletes" were in the Olympic Games; asked, once again, at what facilities to the majority of athletes, given the U Conway's November 14 is clear however that the adequate to carry out all new construction in the

The task force also stresses that "the university recognizes and supports its responsibility to provide this service to every student and staff member", graduates, and "whenever possible to members of the adjacent community." Unfortunately, the "members of the adjacent community — the taxpayers — rank 'third' on the list.

"Mass participation and "Excellence in Athletic Performance" also?

As a fourth goal the task force has chosen "excellence in athletic performance", which its members feel can be attained simultaneously with mass participation.

Again no cost of facilities or manpower for such and objective is mentioned but merely sweeping statements that are difficult to disagree with. Here the goals are: "to provide opportunities for athletes in a few carefully selected sports to pursue world standards of performance and to of T's scarce athletic resources).

There is also little indication where the financial resources for such a program will come from. At the moment a considerable portion of them come from the average student who, in effect, is subsidizing the "excellent" athlete. For example, the University of Toronto Athletic Association (Men) last year subsidized the Varsity Blues hockey team's trip to Poland during last year's Christmas break to the extent of $2,400. An obvious question remains: from where will the money come in the future for such competition—from the university student, the university administration, or the provincial government?

Although the task force report makes vague references to provincial and federal government funds there is no concrete information or guarantee as to who will "bankroll" the development of excellence. One might argue that the university, rather than the student, should be compelled to assume all future costs for extra-league competition, since the university and its name and status benefits the most from its roving Former Olympic runner Bruce Kidd researched the report with Brian Levitt, but there are still several brick hurdles to overcome before new facilities go up on the St. George campus.

The task force report makes no mention of why the field house (or another building with the same facilities — including the proposed track) could not be situated on the parking lot adjacent to the Benson Building.

This might mean that the Great Lakes Institute building would have to go, but this would only result in an internal reallocation of the university's facilities rather than the displacement of community groups and houses. Surely the university is better off lifting the set back restrictions on the property adjacent to the Benson Building than the height restriction and the residents on the now-proposed field house site.

In a brief to the Internal Affairs committee Campus Co-op states that it is "concerned about the loss of housing to the students who are members of our co-operative and to the students and the families in the other houses in this area and we are concerned about the effect of the loss of these residential houses on the surrounding community as a whole. . . . Therefore, we oppose the provision of the task force report which would recommend the construction of the field house."

The Co-op's report also brings to light a possible structural reason for the impracticability of a field house on the site: "A report on soil-core samples taken on that land in 1962 notes a water-seepage problem that might affect the field house adversely."

So, the university could be compelled to fall back onto the alternative plan — a multipurpose area above the pool facilities building to be built adjacent to the Benson Building. However, the task force report claims that a field house would have a floor area twice the size of the multipurpose facility proposed by the 1972 users' report.

The other contentious area for development involves the Robert Street playing field west of Spadina and north of Sussex, and its proposed conversion from green space into more ice and tennis facilities.

The facilities are strongly opposed by the Ulster Raters Association who have other plans for the Robert Street park. Area resident Pierre Beekmans writes that the Robert Street proposal conflicts with the principle of the St. George Campus master plan "that those facilities and activities that are common to the whole campus be progressively given a central location and conversely, that others be given more peripheral locations."

And resident Isme Bennie has also expressed concern over the university's plans to build an Olympic size hockey rink on the Robert Street site. "At a time when capital expenditure for education is being cut back", she writes and when the educational institutions are reassessing their roles, I find it alarming that a university of the stature of the University of Toronto should even consider the development of "world class" expertise in hockey as an objective. And at the expense of the community."

Proposed governing structure does not reflect who pays

Finally, the task force report proposes a "lay body" for policy formulation. Recognizing "the abiding interest the professional faculty has in each of the program areas outlined earlier in this report . . . If the university's policies or priorities are to be changed, they should be changed by a body reflecting the great diversity of interest on this campus."

The School of Physical and Health education, the present departments of athletics and recreation, the central administration, and the community should all have input to the new decision-making body, but the majority of members should be users. The user members should be selected by direct election of an equal number of men and women from and by all people who hold lockerettes or lockers, regardless of their status within the university."

However, this system neglects the fact of who pays for the athletic program itself. While this "user" system may be adequate for allocation of building demands and requirements, it by no means solves the problem of students having little control over where their money goes — and students presently pay over 50 per cent of the annual athletic operating budget in the men's department and almost the whole shot in the women's department. (The University of Toronto Athletic Association (Men) financial statement for the pst year reveals that athletic fees levied from students amounted to $263,062 of the total athletic budget of $442,961; for the women the corresponding figure was $95,994 out of the total of $119,377.) The report fails to allow that those who pay have any control over their own program, thereby adding another serious fault.

However, the report appears to have some regard for community groups: ". . . it is recommended that a community liaison committee should be set up which should have the responsibility for establishing priorities with regard to request for community use of university facilities. This body should be representative of users interested in the use of the facilities for training, competition and special demonstrations and users from the adjacent community whose requirements would be recreational."

The task force report, aside from the above-mentioned faults, is a definitive report on the feasibility of new athletic structures to be combined with those that already exist. The adoption of most of its recommendations could lay the ground work for a completely different university-city relationship.

Eaton's is on its way up....

....while others are coming down

The Eaton Center moves onward and downward daily, as Teperman does its thing to downtown property in preparation for the Yonge St. facelift that Eaton's is offering us. The property around Yonge and Dundas is a maze of walkways and fallen rock zones as downowners are treated to the gentle rhythm of the wrecking balls.

Eaton's, after fighting its battle for about seven years, finally got the okay to start the development (after a little help from U of T's Governing Council) and demolition of properties below Dundas St. between Yonge and Bay Streets was started about a month ago. Opposition came from various groups in the surrounding area, but only one, the congregation of Trinity Anglican Church, managed to force any real changes in the plans.

The buildings headed for that great brickyard in the sky are between 220 and 300 Yonge St., 10 to 14 Albert St., 10 to 24 Louisa St., 9 to 11 Trinity Square, 25, 89 and 91 Dundas St., and 10 and 12 Teraulay St.

The present work is only for phase one of a multi-phase development that will eventually cover most of the Yonge-Bay-Dundas-Queen area with offices and the biggest, most fantasmagoric shopping center you've ever seen. Work is expected to continue until 1980.

Ah, beautiful concrete, certainly what Toronto needs more of.

CODE OF BEHAVIOUR

(Passed by the Governing Council in June 1973, to come into force upon a date to be set after subsequent approval of discipline structures and procedures.)

In view of the fact that there seem to be conflicting ideas and impressions about the Code of Behaviour which has been approved but which is not yet in effect, the University is publishing the Code in full so that students may be fully informed of all its provisions. Approval of the Code earlier this year was given on the understanding that it would come into force at an appropriate time for implementation to be determined when discipline structures and procedures for academic and non-academic offences were approved by the Governing Council. It is hoped that everyone on campus will read the Code of Behaviour and will thus be able to relate its provisions to the proposals for discipline structures which will come before the Governing Council on November 22.

Introduction

This Code applies only to students and members of the teaching staff. It does not, as presently drafted, apply to non-academic staff. A Code to apply to non-academic staff may be prepared in the future after consultation with representatives of those concerned.

The provisions of the code dealing with non-academic offences will have to be passed by the appropriate bodies in the federated universities and colleges before it will apply to members of those institutions.

CODE OF BEHAVIOUR

A. PREAMBLE

As citizens, members of the University community enjoy the same basic rights as do all citizens and are bound by the same responsibilities to respect the rights of others as are all citizens. Therefore breaches of the Code of Behaviour in the University which are also breaches of the law will normally be dealt with in the courts. However, if the University is involved or affected as an academic institution, these breaches of the Code of Behaviour may also be dealt with hereunder.

(Note: The code is not intended to give the University power to prosecute members before the university's courts for offences which are criminal unless the university's academic life is affected by such an offence.)

The University does not serve as a sanctuary from the laws governing all citizens. Nor does it stand in loco parentis to any of its members, and each member is free to organize his or her own personal life and behaviour subject only to the law and to the duly established rules of the University.

B. THE RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS ENJOYED BY MEMBERS OF THE UNIVERSITY

All members enjoy the right to the fullest possible freedom of enquiry. In particular, this includes:

- the freedom to communicate in any reasonable way, and to discuss and explore any idea;
 - the freedom to move about the University and to the reasonable use of the facilities of the University;
 - the freedom from discrimination on the basis of sex, race or religion;
 - the freedom in respect of offices, lockers, residences and private papers from unjustified invasions of privacy.
- In addition, all members enjoy the following freedoms in relation to their freedom of association;
- the freedom to hold and advertise meetings, to debate and to engage in peaceful demonstrations;
 - the freedom to organize groups for any lawful purpose;
 - the freedom of the reasonable use of University facilities for the purposes of any lawful group.

C. INTERPRETATION

1. Unless otherwise provided herein, words defined in section 1 of the University of Toronto Act, 1971, have the same meaning in this Code as in that Act.

2. In this Code, unless the context otherwise requires,

- (a) "group" means a club, society, association, committee or other body of members having an affinity based upon common or collective interest or purpose, whether or not incorporated and whether or not officially recognized by the University;
- (b) "member" or "member of the University" means a student or a member of the teaching staff, teaching assistant or research associate in the University, and includes a group;
- (c) "Tribunal" includes the University Tribunal and any other person or body established or authorized by the Governing Council to exercise disciplinary jurisdiction over members;
- (d) "University" includes the University of Toronto, University College and the constituent colleges, faculties, departments, schools, institutes and other divisions of the University.

D. NON-ACADEMIC OFFENCES

(Note: The list of available sanctions and the conditions under which they are to be imposed by the Tribunal are contained in sections F(1) and G herein.)

1. In order to protect the administrative processes of the University, it shall be an offence for any member:

- | | No. of Maximum Sanction | First Offence | Second and Subsequent Offences |
|--|---|---------------------------|--------------------------------|
| (a) to furnish knowingly any false information to the University, | (iv) | (xi) | |
| (b) with intent to become a member of the University or to gain a financial benefit or credit in a course or programme of study, to furnish knowingly any false information to the University; | (xi) | (xi) | |
| (c) fraudulently, or with intent to harm the University, any member, former member or any other employee of the University, to forge, alter, use, destroy or remove a University record or document of any kind; | (xi) | (xi) | |
| (d) to use the name of the University without lawful authority or permission. | by an individual - (iv) first offence
by a group - | same as for first offence | |

2. In order to protect the property and physical facilities of the University and the property of its members, it shall be an offence for any member:

- | | No. of Maximum Sanction | First Offence | Second and Subsequent Offences |
|---|-------------------------|--|--------------------------------|
| (a) to steal, damage intentionally or recklessly interfere with the operation of any property of the University; | | if loss or damage less than $100 - (v)
if $100 or more - (xi) | same as for first offence |
| (b) to steal or damage intentionally or recklessly any library materials, laboratory supplies, equipment or instructional media of the University; | (ix) | | (xi) |
| (c) to be persistently in breach of the rules and regulations governing the use of any University library; | (xi) | | (xi) |
| (d) to obtain fraudulently any benefit of any kind from the use of University property or facilities; | (ix) | | (xi) |
| (e) to abuse intentionally or recklessly any privilege to use the computer facilities or instructional media of the University; | (xi) | | (xi) |
| (f) to steal or damage intentionally or recklessly the property of any person when such property is in the possession of the University or any member or on any premises of the University; | (v) | | (xi) |

(Note: This clause is obviously wide enough to permit the prosecution of a member under this Code for offences which might have nothing to do with the University as an academic institution, for example, stealing a bicycle. It is thought, however, that it would be extremely difficult to draft the clause in a more restrictive way. It is intended, as stated in the preamble, that the code will not be used unless the University is affected as an academic institution. The decision to prosecute before the Tribunal will, in general, be left to the administrative officials of the University.)

- (g) to harm any member in his academic pursuits, by stealing or damaging intentionally or recklessly the property of any person when such property is in the possession of the University or any member or on any premises of the University.

3. In order to protect the rights and freedoms of all members of the University community, it shall be an offence for any member:

- | | No. of Maximum Sanction | First Offences | Second and Subsequent |
|--|-------------------------|----------------|-----------------------|
| (a) to abuse physically or defame any person on any premises of the University or at any function or activity held by or under the auspices of the University; | (iv) | | (xi) |
| (b) to disrupt intentionally, disturb or obstruct unduly any authorized activity on any premises of the University or any function or activity held by or under the auspices of the University; | (iv) | | (xi) |
| (c) to endanger intentionally or recklessly the health or safety of any person on any premises of the University or continue intentionally or recklessly to do anything which is likely to endanger the health or safety of any such person; | (xi) | | (xi) |
| (d) for or with intent to gain a reward or benefit, to furnish or supply to or permit to be used by or made available to any person, any academic writing, essay, theses, research report, project, assignment, notes or results of academic work or research, whether written, made or obtained by the accused or by any other person, knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe that the same are likely to be used by any person for the purpose of obtaining fraudulently any academic standing or credit in a course or programme of study in the University or at any other academic institution by any person, if a member of the University or any other academic institution, or by any member of the University or any other academic institution; | (xi) | | (xi) |

(Note: This clause is intended to provide a means for disciplining any member who participates in "essay-banks". At the moment it is extremely difficult to control such activities under the Criminal Code. This clause only applies to members of the University and cannot affect anyone who is not a member.)

- (e) subject to the other provisions of this code, to disobey any lawful order, rule or regulation made by the Governing Council or any faculty council, school council or other authorized body or council of the University or any authorized committee or sub-committee of any of them;
- (f) to disobey any lawful order of any executive officer of the Governing Council or of the University or any Dean, Director, Principal or other head of a college, school, institute, faculty, department or division of the University;

(Note: A lawful order, rule, etc., will be one made in the execution of a power conferred on the body or officer concerned under the appropriate rules of the Governing Council and the University of Toronto Act. The onus will be on the prosecution to show that any purported power has been lawfully exercised.)

- (g) to disobey any order of the Tribunal.

E. ACADEMIC OFFENCES

(Note: Academic offences relate to the honesty and fairness of the teaching and learning relationship, especially with respect to evaluation. Thus the essence of an academic offence by a student is the seeking of credit by fraud or misrepresentation rather than on the basis of merit. The essence of an academic offence by a teacher is dishonesty or unfairness in dealing with the work or record of a student. Shortcomings in academic performance due to neglect or incompetence ought not to be dealt with by disciplinary processes but by suitable administrative action. In the case of the student they will be reflected in the student's academic standing. In the case of the teacher they are primarily failures to fulfill obligations to the University as employer and should be dealt with accordingly.

Of the offences listed here, E.1.(a)(i), (ii), (iv) and (v) relate to offences by students. E.1.(a)(iii) is an offence that can only be committed by a member who is either a member of the teaching staff or a member acting in that capacity, as, for example, a teaching assistant.

(The list of available sanctions and their conditions under which they are to be imposed by the Tribunal are contained in Sections F(2) and G herein.)

1. In order to protect the integrity of the teaching, learning and evaluation processes of the University it shall be an offence for any member,

- (a) with intent to deceive:
- (i) to use unauthorized aids or obtain unauthorized assistance in any assistance in any academic writing, essay, thesis, research report, project or assignment submitted for credit in a course or programme of study, or on an examination;
- (ii) to represent as that of the member in any academic writing, essay, thesis, research report, project or assignment submitted for credit in a course or programme of study, any idea or expression of an idea of another;

(Note: This clause covers both plagiarism in parts of a work and the case where the student obtains an entire essay, etc., and submits it as his own.)

- (iii) to represent as that of the member any idea or expression of an idea contained in any academic writing, essay, thesis, research report, project or assignment submitted for credit in, or otherwise in connection with, any course or programme of study;
- (iv) to submit for credit in any course or programme of study, without the knowledge and approval of the member to whom it is submitted, any academic writing, essay, thesis, research report, project or assignment for which credit has previously been obtained or is being sought in another course or programme of study in the University or elsewhere;
- (v) to submit for credit in any course or programme of study any academic writing, essay, thesis, research report, project or assignment containing a purported statement of fact or reference to a source which has been fabricated.
- (b) To the benefit or detriment of a member or former member:
- (i) to evaluate work performed by the member for credit in a course or programme of study by reference to any criterion that does not relate to the merit of the work;
- (ii) to evaluate an application duly made by the member or former member who is seeking admission or transfer to a course or programme of study by reference to any criterion that does not relate to the academic suitability of the applicant for the course or programme of study, except that where a limitation on enrolment in the course or programme of study exists, academically suitable candidates may be selected by duly established and published criteria.

(Note: This clause does not apply to cases where improper criteria have been used to evaluate an application by a person who is not a member or former member at the time the application is made. Such conduct does not relate to the process of evaluation or to the honesty and fairness of the teaching and learning relationship among members of the University.)

2. In order to protect the integrity of the degrees, diplomas and certificates granted by the University, the Tribunal shall have power to recommend to the Governing Council the cancellation, recall or suspension of any degree, diploma or certificate obtained by any alumnus who, while a member, committed any academic offence, which if detected before the granting of the degree, diploma or certificate, would, in the judgment of the Tribunal, have resulted upon conviction in the application of any sanction sufficiently severe to lead to the loss of credit in any course or programme of study pursued by that alumnus, so that the degree, diploma or certificate would not have been granted.

F. SANCTIONS

1. Non-Academic

Subject to the provisions of section G hereof, the following sanctions, listed in order of increasing severity, may be imposed by the Tribunal upon conviction of any member of a non-academic offence as hereinafter defined:

- (i) Admonition; (ii) Caution or warning; (iii) Censure or reprimand;
- (iv) Probation (upon such terms as the Tribunal may consider appropriate);
- (v) Restitution (by the restoration or return of property, the rendering of services or the payment of the costs of repair or replacement of property);
- (vi) Fine;
- (vii) In the event of breach of probation or failure to make restitution or to pay a fine, withholding of degrees, diplomas, certificates or academic standing or transcripts of results or marks obtained;
- (viii) Withdrawal of recognition or status on such terms as the Tribunal may impose;
- (ix) Exclusion from University facilities, withdrawal or suspension of privileges or restriction of use and enjoyment thereof;
- (x) Suspension for such period not exceeding two years from the end of the session in which order of the Tribunal was made, as the Tribunal may determine;
- (xi) Expulsion or removal.

2. Academic

(a) Subject to the provisions of section G hereof, the following sanctions, listed in order of increasing severity, may be imposed by the Tribunal upon conviction of any student of any academic offence as hereinafter defined:

- (i) Caution or warning; (ii) Censure or reprimand;
- (iii) Failure in or cancellation of credit for any course or programme of study in respect of which any academic offence was committed;
- (iv) Suspension from attendance in all courses in which the student is registered at the time the offence was committed for any period less than twelve months from the date on which the offence was committed, and with loss of credit for all courses which have not been completed or in which no grade or final evaluation has been registered at that time;
- (v) Suspension for such period not exceeding two years from the end of the session in which order of the Tribunal was made, as the Tribunal may determine; (vi) Expulsion.

(b) Subject to the provisions of section G hereof, the following sanctions, listed in order of increasing severity, may be imposed by the Tribunal upon conviction of any member of the teaching staff, teaching assistant, research associate or student when such student is acting in the course of any duty as teaching assistant, part-time lecturer or full-time lecturer in the University, of an academic offence as hereinafter defined:

- (i) Caution or warning; (ii) Censure or reprimand;

- (iii) Recommendation to the President for the application of administrative sanctions which may include, denial of merit pay increase, postponement of consideration for tenure or promotion, but which shall not include removal; (iv) Removal.

G. CONDITIONS OF IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS AND PARTIES TO OFFENCES

1. A member who commits any offence set out in section D hereof (herein called a "non-academic offence") is liable, upon first conviction for such offence, as a maximum penalty, to the sanction listed in clause 1 of section F hereof, the number of which is set out in the first column opposite the description of the offence, and to any one or more of the sanctions listed in that clause which are less severe, and upon the second or subsequent conviction for such offence, as a maximum penalty, to the sanction listed therein, the number of which is set out in the second column opposite the description of the offence, and to any one or more of such sanctions which are less severe.

2. A member who commits any offence set out in section E hereof (herein called an "academic offence") is liable upon conviction for such offence to any one or more of the sanctions listed in clause 2 of section F hereof which are applicable to such member.

3. The penalty of suspension shall not be available as a sanction in respect of a member of the teaching staff.

4. The Tribunal shall not have power to order expulsion of a student or removal of a member of the teaching staff, and has power only to recommend that these penalties be imposed. In any such case the recommendation shall be made by the Tribunal to the President for a recommendation by him to the Governing Council. In the case of removal of a member of the teaching staff having tenure, the recommendation shall be made by the Tribunal to the President for the appointment of a committee under the Policy Statement on Academic Tenure published October, 1967 (commonly known as the Haist Rules) as amended from time to time, to consider removal on the ground of gross misconduct. If a recommendation of the Tribunal for expulsion or removal is not adopted, the case shall be remitted to the Tribunal, which shall have power to impose such lesser penalty as it sees fit. In any case where expulsion is ordered upon conviction under sub-clause (b) of clause 1 of section D, Non-Academic Offences, the Tribunal may recommend that such order for expulsion shall not prevent the member from subsequently applying to become a member of the University.

(Note: The University of Toronto Act gives the power to remove a member of the teaching staff to the Governing Council. It has been thought desirable to treat students in the same way. The existence of the Haist Rules, however, requires that the recommendation to the President for removal of a member of the teaching staff having tenure be made after a hearing under those rules. This does allow for a multiplicity of proceedings with the possibility of added costs and embarrassment for the member concerned. Care will have to be taken that, wherever possible, when removal of a member of the teaching staff having tenure is contemplated, the procedure under the Haist Rules and not this code be followed. Proposed instructions to those having power to begin proceedings under this Code will attempt to establish guidelines to avoid, if possible, any duplication of proceedings.)

The final sentence of this clause is felt to be necessary so that those who become members on the strength of false information are treated equally with those who are detected before becoming members. Normally a member who is expelled cannot re-apply. This provision allows the Tribunal to recommend to the Governing Council that the member be permitted to re-apply.)

5. A fine is appropriate in the following cases only:

- (i) as an administrative sanction under duly established rules or regulations for libraries;
- (ii) As a collective sanction against a group.

6. The penalty of withholding degrees, diplomas, certificates, academic standing or transcripts is available, in the case of non-academic offences, only for failure to obey an order of the Tribunal, and only where the Tribunal has ordered restitution or the payment of a fine or has imposed terms of probation, except that standing and transcripts will automatically be withheld in accordance with duly established rules or regulations for libraries for failure to pay library fines unless it is otherwise ordered by the Tribunal on appeal by the member fined.

(Note: Paragraphs 5 and 6 are not intended in any way to restrict the power of the University to withhold standing, transcripts, etc. for failure to pay fees or in any case, other than a discipline one, where such power is now exercised.)

7. An order for the payment of money against a member who is entitled to any remuneration from the University may be enforced against his remuneration by deduction therefrom or withholding thereof, and an order for the payment of money against a group which receives funds or grants from the University, or from student or staff fees or levies through the agency of the University, may be enforced against such funds, grants, fees or levies by deduction therefrom or withholding thereof.

8. The sanctions available against a group are numbers (i) to (vi) inclusive and (viii) and (ix) listed in clause 1 of section F hereof. Sanction number (viii) is only available against a group.

9. The Tribunal may, if it considers it appropriate, make a report of its findings in any case to the President or other officer of the University or to the Dean, Director, Principal or other head having jurisdiction over the member concerned, and may publish or order the publication of a notice of its decision or order in any case, and of any sanction imposed, in such manner as the Tribunal directs.

10.(1) Every member is a party to an offence under this Code who:

- (a) actually commits it;
- (b) does or omits to do anything for the purpose of aiding or assisting another member to commit the offence;
- (c) does or omits to do anything for the purpose of aiding or assisting any other person who, if that person were a member, would have committed the offence;
- (d) abets, counsels, procures or conspires with another member to commit or be a party to the offence; or
- (e) abets, counsels, procures or conspires with any other person who, if that person were a member, would have committed or have been a party to the offence.

(2) Every party to an offence under this Code is liable upon conviction to the sanctions applicable to that offence.

11. Every member who, with intent to commit an offence under this Code, does or omits to do anything for the purpose of carrying out that intention is guilty of an attempt to commit the offence and liable upon conviction to the same sanctions as if he had committed the offence.

12. Where a group is guilty of an offence under this Code, every officer, director or agent of the group, being a member of the University, who directed, authorized or participated in the commission of the offence is a party to and guilty of the offence and is liable upon conviction to the sanctions provided for the offence whether or not the group has been prosecuted or convicted hereunder.

Words break, hurt and kill at Hart House

By SANDRA SOUCHOTTE

The title of David Rabe's play, Sticks and Bones, playing at Hart

House Theatre until Nov. 24, brings to mind a reductive version of the nursery rhyme jingle:

"Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me."

Young men return home from war broken and propped up with sticks. While away they have broken bones with sticks and followed skull and cross-bone banners disguised as the flag of their country.

The real threat, though, is not the instruments or symbols of aggression but the life which nurtures it and the words which expose it.

And in this play it is the words which break, hurt and kill.

Under Marc Diamond's astute direction, Sticks and Bones captures the experience of a middle-class cartoon family who slowly become aware that another dimension has been inked into their poster-color, comic strip life.

That other dimension is imposed upon them with the return of the oldest son David, a blind war veteran who is now a blackly etched caricature of the person they once knew.

He brings with him the shadows of an experience which they do not want to admit existed, threatening the protective banality of a world where the surface scarcely ripples.

Although styled after the media smooth Nelson family, Ozzie, Harriet, David and Ricky, director Diamond plays his characters closer to their more decayed counterparts in "An American Family".

And it is not the soda pop Ricky Nelson tunes which weave together each scene but the harder, socially aggressive sounds of a decade later.

Because of this the play loses some of the situation comedy glibness which both offsets and accentuates the cold horror of what these people are really saying to each other.

A less intense unawareness might have heightened the actuality of a family life (which is a national life style) built on fraud, little lies and evasions.

As it is we wait not for the final glub "that cartoon people say when they are drowning," but for something like the shock technique ending which we get.

Diamond builds the play as a smooth cruise to bloody Hell and each member of the cast shifts in and out of the various levels of evasion along the way with compelling accuracy.

Bradley Bernstein as Father Donald gives a splendid interpretation of the defeated and bewildered priest as he drifts out of the house after his confrontation with David.

James Dugan sustains a powerful performance of Ozzie's tragic mediocrity and provides the definitive portrait of this solid suburban house of straw in the beautifully controlled material possessions scene.

Here Ozzie, in a final attempt to both prove and justify his existence, defines himself according to a list of everything that he owns.

Gary Shallenberg's David is a strong, dark presence in the play through whom we sense the coffin-like atmosphere of this cozy home.

This feeling is emphasized by designer Guy Allen's fully expressive set. David's bedroom, stark, open and defined by a rigid framework of supports, sits like a malignant cell amidst the soft gloss of the rest of the house.

It is an effective example of the production's talent for melding the abstract with the solidly real.

Although the play's final horrific image tends to obscure the less physically tangible menace in the house, it does explore the elastic transitions of a particular value system: from football field to the battle-field, from screwing easy makes in the front seat of a car to brothel service overseas, from motherhood and apple pie (in this case fudge and scrambled eggs) to gangbangers and napalm, from guitar strings to the razor's edge.

And bringing it all full circle is a television set with which ironically we can now re-play the Nelson Family and Vietnam together.

David, a blind war veteran (James Dugan) is brought back home.

Grads over Trinity B 2-1 in soccer

Grads soccer team Milled Trinity B like so much flour and baked them into a loaf of Brown bread, ending any hopes they might have Fostered for winning the third division Arts Cup championship.

The final score was a very tight 2-1, reflecting the strong defensive play and evenly matched teams. Jeff Miller scored the opening goal for Grads close to the end of the first half when the ref failed to call an offside high cross to Les Foster.

Forster pitched the ball out to the right wing and in the ensuing scramble the ball returned to the centre where Miller ground exceeding fine.

The muddy centre dominated the first half as Trinity centre-half Jamie Ker directed a slow attack.

In the second half both teams went more to the wings with longer pass and run plays, to speed up the tempo.

Grads could not keep the wolf from the door forever, and at 25 minutes Tom De Wolf picked up a sharp through ball to even it up.

In spite of the cold and mud this spurred both teams on to even faster play, with Grads getting more of the chances as they started to break through the centre. At 35 minutes they finally clicked when a shot bounced off goalie Mike Onions' chest and onto Phil Brown's waiting foot.

Trinity pressed hard for a counter, but Grads' defence and goal withstood the onslaught to make their return to interfaculty soccer one of unalloyed success.

Vic narrowly won the fall inter-fac swim meet, edging out Meds with a comeback in the final event. The top four team scores were: 1. Vic 69; 2. Meds 68; 3. Eng 42; 4. Trin 39. Two protests that may or may not have been filed on the first event could change the standings.

In the individual results, Meds won four of seven.

Blues take three, lose one

By TOM WOODS

The men's intercollegiate volleyball season began Saturday in Ottawa with the Blues emerging with three wins and one defeat.

In the opener, the Blues had little trouble in racking up an easy 15-0, 15-8 win against a scrappy Carleton squad. Varsity relied on fundamental volleyball with high passes and outside spiking by Captain Ivars Kopsitals and rookie Ihor Lotocky.

Blues second victory came against inexperienced RMC by scores of 15-1, 15-3. In this game the setter-spiker combination of Struhanyk to Kopsitals plus additional hitting by Woods, Kovaloff and Inksetter dominated RMC's weak defence.

In the third match Varsity used a faster type of offence with low, quick passes from a back court setter. The result was a 15-1, 15-7 win over the Ottawa Gee-Gees.

The consistent blocking and hustling defence evident in Blues first three matches were at times non-existent in the final game against Queen's. The Gaels gained the upper hand immediately with their experienced Czechoslovakian players baffling the Varsity backcourt with combinations of hard spikes and slow tip shots. Blues' failure to match Queen's sustained offensive attack along with erratic blocking led to 8-15, 9-15 losses.

League play continues next Sunday in Sudbury where the Blues face Laurentian, Ryerson and defending Ontario champion York.

According to coach George Zajac, "York with national team member Peter Stefanuck and three other Olympic prospects will be a major obstacle for our predominately rookie team. To gain a playoff position in the Ontario finals, we must defeat Queens in January at York University Tournament. In the mean-time, we will concentrate on improving our blocking and back-court defense."

Saturday's tournament was the first of four in the eight team eastern division double round-robin schedule. York was the overall winner with a 4-0 record; Queen's and Varsity following at 3-1. Two teams qualify from each division to playoff for the Ontario berth in the CIAU championships in February.

Blues down York in home opener

By DAVID COOK

Blues handed York their first loss of the season, completely outclassing the Yeomen 8-4 in their home opener at Varsity arena Friday night.

York was expected to play their usual hard skating style of game and keep pace with the Blues. In the final analysis the game was very disappointing because York performed in a lacklustre style as if they'd forgotten that Varsity was the team to beat.

As usual Blues scoring prowess and tenacious checking were the undoing of a sleepy York squad. Only sporadically did the Yeomen shift out of low gear.

York goalie Wayne Weatherbee performed magically in the nets as he faced a barrage of 53 shots. Blues' Jim Campbell was equal to the task as a patchy York offence fired 26 shots on net.

Blues were frustrated in the first period as an acrobatic Weatherbee held a powerful Varsity attack at bay until Don Pagnutti banged in a rebound on a power play shot by Kent Runkhe while York's Paul Cerre was off for tripping.

At times play was chippy but Blues continued to dominate as they took the initiative and kept the Yeomen off-balance throughout the first period.

Led by Gord Davies, the Blues prevented York from scoring on two power play opportunities. Don Pagnutti notched his second power play goal at the end of the period, deflecting a shot from the point by Al Milnes culminating an awesome display of puck control in the York zone.

Blues came out flying in the second period. Excellent forechecking by Bill Fifield and linemates Bill Hews and Doug Herridge paid off as Herridge scored on a shot that Weatherbee had lost sight of.

Rookie defenceman Chuck Luksa shortly afterwards put smooth skating Ivan McFarlane in alone on Weatherbee with an excellent pass. With pin point accuracy McFarlane caught the top corner and it looked as if Blues were going to walk away with the game leading 4-0 at this point.

Blues continued to use their point men effectively in the York zone and a solid defence stymied any York attacks. Toronto was playing heads-up hockey and was head manning the puck with great expertise.

York fortunes picked up when they answered on a power play goal by Doug Dunsmuir while hard-hitting Luksa was in the penalty box at 4:42. The goal sparked the Yeomen to life. Up until then only Paul Cerre and Barry Jenkins had given any indication that the Yeomen hadn't taken sleeping pills before the game.

Two minutes later Luksa was off again for tripping and Al Avery scored a power play goal after defenceman Gerri Greenham fired through a maze of players completely screening Campbell.

However, York was snapped back into reality by a hard shot from the point by Al Milnes for his first goal of the young campaign. York didn't give up though and took advantage of defensive lapses by Toronto to score two quick goals around the fifteen minute mark.

Rick Martin scored York's third goal and Dunsmuir scored his second of the night. Then Herridge scored his second goal finishing off scoring in the second period after Fifield won the face-off.

In the third period Runkhe scored right off the bat and then finished off Blues scoring as he netted his second goal of the night. York had lapsed into its uninspired style of game in the third period and except for some perseverance by Varsity, who had many good scoring opportunities, it was a boring period.

A bright note for Blues was the hard hitting of Captain Warren Anderson whose deft fakes and puckhandling skills put him in a class of his own out there. Luksa and Carnaccia were throwing their weight around and the smaller York team was completely outmuscled in the corners and behind the net.

Above all else York's defence was highly suspect, allowing the Blues to pour in almost at will. It was unfortunate that York didn't live up to their rating. Apart from the play of Dunsmuir, Avery, Appleford and Cerre, York has a team that Toronto doesn't have to worry about much this year.

Blues were obviously up for the game and it was too bad that York wasn't equal to the challenge. The convincing win puts Toronto on top of the eastern section, undefeated in four starts. Blues play away against Ryerson Rams tomorrow night.

Basketball Blues tighten up too late: 73-66

By BOB PRITCHARD

Varsity Basketball Blues started off their season on the wrong foot, losing 73-66 to the Ottawa Gee Gees on Friday night in the Benson Building.

The Blues certainly couldn't blame their loss on a lack of supporters; despite competition from the York-Toronto hockey game, there was a surprising crowd of over 100 spectators on hand to cheer on the team (possibly because there was no admission charge).

Varsity started the match using a zone defence, but shortly switched to man-to-man situation throughout the game.

The first 20 minutes saw little excitement, with Blues going into the changeroom on the lower half of all the statistics. Toronto's shooting percentage was only 28% compared to Ottawa's 33%, while the Gee Gees outshot Varsity 87% to 80% from the foul line.

Probably the most significant statistic was in the rebounding, where Ottawa was ahead 26-18. Blues lost some important defensive rebounds which gave the Gee Gees second and third shots at the Toronto basket on which they often connected. All this added up to a 40-29 score at the half. In favour of Ottawa.

Going into the second half, the Blues began to tighten up on the boards, and also started to run with the ball. The Gee Gees tried to counteract this with a full court man-to-man press, but Toronto had little difficulty breaking it.

Ottawa then made a series of turnovers by careless play and offensive fouls. Blues made the most of this with some steals and fast breaks, and after 10 minutes of play, Varsity had outscored the Gee Gees 17-8, narrowing the Ottawa lead to 48-46. But some alert plays by Gee Gees' Barry Mosley, combined with some sloppy rebounding and missed foul shots on the Blues part put the Gee Gees ahead 58-50.

Once again Varsity came to life, with rookie Doug Fox stealing the ball and then connecting on two baskets and a foul shot. With two minutes left in the game, the Blues had closed the gap to 65-62, with Toronto's Frank Cress at the foul line in a bonus situation.

Unfortunately, Cress choked on the shot, and that was as close as Varsity got, as Ottawa added a few more baskets and went on to win 73-66.

The real credit for the Ottawa victory has to go to their guards John Plaskacz and Pat Woodburn, and forward Barry Mosley, who among them accounted for half their team's points. Veteran Plaskacz (who hit 12 of 12 from the foul line in the half) and Woodburn, who played with the Waterloo Warriors last season, were both impressive ball handlers, and were instrumental in getting their offence going. Captain Merv Sabey, who was second highest scorer and rebounder in the east last year put in a poor performance for his club.

On the Blues' side, Glenn Scott led the scoring, chalking up 18 points with some good outside shooting and driving. Doug Fox looks like he may provide some needed bench strength for Varsity's guard contingent.

Blues improved their rebounding (22 compared to Ottawa's 21), but once again fell short in floor shooting (35% to Ottawa's 38%) and foul shooting (58% to 78%).

Toronto will have to work on their offensive plays as for the most part, they were ineffective against the Gee Gees, who by comparison, frequently made the Blues defence look sloppy by getting the ball to an open man.

TIP OFF: Toronto travels to Waterloo on Monday to meet the Laurier Golden Hawks, and then travels to Guelph on Wednesday to play the Gryphons. Both those are exhibition games. The game against Ottawa counted for points. Laurier has five team members returning this year, led by Rod Daan, the number two scorer in the league last year, Joe Macrito, of Toronto high school fame. Is also on the team. Toronto plays Laurentian, York, Carleton, Ottawa, Ryerson, Queens and RMC in its division this year.

The next league game is Saturday at the Benson against Carleton.

Sid Smith discipline rally tomorrow, Council may delay vote on Code

By BOB BETTSON

Students are planning a mass rally at Sid Smith tomorrow at 3:30 pm to protest the administration's proposed discipline code. After the rally they will move to Simcoe Hall where Governing Council is to discuss implementation of the code.

The U of T administration appears to be backing down on immediate implementation of the code and Internal Affairs Committee chairwoman Marnie Paikin has recommended that the Governing Council delay a decision on implementation.

The delay could mean the code may be approved at the council's December meeting when students will be off campus or writing exams.

However the council's Executive Committee has endorsed the motion previously passed by Internal Affairs to proceed with implementation of the code and tribunal system at a date to be determined by the Internal Affairs Committee and reported to the council for information.

This motion will be the one debated at the Governing Council and a move to table will be necessary to delay implementation of the code.

However, the student steering committee for rejection of the code is going ahead with plans for the rally. It is also sponsoring a noon hour forum tomorrow with U of T vice-president Jill Conway, a drafter of the code. The forum also is to include SAC president Bob Anderson.

There was a mix up in the arrangements for the forum between Conway, Anderson and SAC vice-president Steve Moses. Conway had agreed to a discussion, but Moses designed a poster which billed it as a debate.

However, Conway refused to attend if it was a "debate". She told The Varsity that "the word debate was not mentioned. I am prepared to act as a resource person and answer questions on details, background and timing of the code."

But, she maintained, "I couldn't participate in a debate when this is still a policy issue before the Governing Council."

Conway will be bringing law professor John Swan to answer questions about the meaning of specific wording in the code. The code was printed by the university on pages 12 and 13 of Monday's Varsity.

Opposition to the code is mounting among student organizations. Already SAC, the GSU and APUS have supported rejection of the code and they have been joined by student councils at St. Mike's, Music, Scarborough and Innis, the Arts and Science Student Union and a number of student council presidents.

Other local student councils are expected to reject the code soon and students have been supported by the faculty reform caucus. All eight student governors oppose the code.

The student steering committee is going to try, through the student governors, to change the order of the Governing Council agenda.

Discipline has been placed last after consideration of the budget in closed session and the administration's plan to phase out the Faculty of Food Sciences.

Apparently the council intends to open the meeting in camera and prevent anyone except council members from entering until the budget discussions is concluded.

Despite the move to postpone the vote, which has the support of President John Evans who supported the move at yesterday's Academic Affairs committee meeting, the students are convinced the administration wants to implement the code without any basic changes.

"Their aim in moving to table is to defuse opposition to the code, to make it seem as if they are willing to incorporate changes," says a steering committee statement. The steering committee is a coalition of representatives of interested student organizations.

The statement calls the motion to table "a partial victory" but warns that students should not "be lulled into a false sense of security." The steering committee is demanding assurances from the Governing Council that the code will not be dealt with during the months in which most students are preparing for or writing exams or off campus.

The statement calls for all students to come to Sidney Smith at 3:30 tomorrow "to make it clear to the Governors that the code is unacceptable to the majority of the university community."

The controversial code includes clauses prohibiting disruptive demonstrations as well as a number of other vaguely-worded clauses giving the U of T administration sweeping powers to enforce the code. Students would be tried by tribunals with two students, two faculty and an alumni member.

Faculty members would be immune to prosecution under the code, being subject instead to the Haist rules (drawn up by the now defunct Senate) which exclude students from participation in hiring, firing and tenure committees.

Academic Affairs begins discussion on Forster report

By Chris Probert

More than three months after its release, the Academic Affairs Committee began point-by-point discussion yesterday of the Forster Report recommendations.

The committee's discussion followed the outline of president John Evans' response to the Forster task force, and dealt with the least-controversial sections first.

In Tuesday's meeting, the first five proposals were approved. Approval was for principles, rather than for specific procedures.

Discussion at first centred on proposal number five, which aims to 'standardize university appointments procedure'.

University vice-president Don Forster said he thought that "many of the objections which have been made to the suggestions for granting tenure are a function of conditions in the '60s. The '70s, however, will be a decade of far fewer appointments, which will provide an opportunity for more careful review."

An additional clause to proposal five was under consideration, "permitting the provost to waive the requirements for hiring in the recommendations in unusual cases."

Student representative David Laughton argued for clarification of the phrase "in unusual cases." He feared that this would be interpreted to mean that the work load of assessing applicant qualifications could become "an unusual case" which the provost could then waive.

"The difficulties of this university in the '60s have mostly come from bad handling of academic appointments—perhaps because so many had to be made in a short time," he said. He referred specifically to the takeover by American academics.

In response, president John Evans said he thought "unusual" implied "rare," and therefore "a wholesale takeover" would not come under the terms of the clause.

Faculty committee member W.B. Dunphy moved an addition to the clause "Cases where the requirements are waived will be reported to the Academic Affairs Committee," which passed.

The committee then turned to proposals two and four, particularly four, which deals with cross-appointment between U of T and other universities in Canada.

Student rep Gordon Barnes asked it be made plain that the recommendation was "an academic thing, not a way of cutting corners."

Forster said there were two good reasons for a policy of cross-appointments. The first was "financial necessity, especially in esoteric areas. Second, there are solid academic reasons." The "solid academic reasons" are the services of the visiting academic without this university needing to give a commitment to that teaching staff member.

Sale final: U of T walks away with $400,000

By DICK BROWN

U of T has received $400,000 cash in its sale of 188 Yonge St. to a subsidiary of the Fairview Corporation.

Documents on file with the land registry office at city hall indicate the deal was completed November 9 with a straight cash deal, no strings attached.

The university received just over $202 per square foot for the 1,980 square foot property.

By comparison, 10 months ago in January, McMaster University in Hamilton bought 182 and 184 Yonge St. for just over $167 per square foot, the total purchase price being $615,000 for the larger parcels of land.

McMaster already owns 180 Yonge St. and Eaton's Co. owns 186 Yonge St.

In a memo dated September 26 sent to the External Affairs Committee of U of T's Governing Council by U of T's Business Affairs vice-president Alex Rankin, Rankin urged approval of the sale, saying:

"The price offered is considerably in excess of the value of the property arrived at by capitalization of present incomes."

"The price is also in excess of what our realty appraisers have estimated to be a fair market price having regard to the land sales in the vicinity."

Fairview's ownership, through its subsidiary 268882 Ontario Ltd., of 188 Yonge St. completes the land assembly for the proposed Eaton's Centre complex.

Demolition of properties along Yonge Street between Queen and Dundas Streets has already begun. The 188 property housed a Reitman's women's wear store before the purchase by Fairview's subsidiary.

U of T's sale of the property created a stir of controversy because of a provision in a 1922 will by Naomi Bilton who left the land to the university on the condition it never be sold to the Eaton company or any firm representing Eaton's.

That clause in the will sent university lawyers off to the law books to find a loophole which would allow the sale. While Simcoe Hall has not said what loophole it is they found, Governing Council was assured of the legality of the sale last month when final university approval was made.

The clause in the Bilton will stems from a quarrel begun over 100 years ago between Naomi's father and Timothy Eaton, founder of the Eaton's chain, over access to the laneway behind the Yonge Street property.

That quarrel still lives, apparently, as the Rankin memo indicates Fairview's subsidiary "will still be bound by the terms and conditions of the Naomi Bilton will and the purchaser is fully cognizant of the fact that the land cannot be sold to the T. Eaton Company nor used as a departmental store."

Rankin's memo indicated the university made an average of more than $10,500 net income per year for the last five years in renting 188 Yonge St. to Reitmans.

The gross income for the five-year period was more than $130,500 with $75,000 going to taxes and $2,818 for maintenance and other expenses. Elsewhere in the memo Rankin mentions the "poor condition of the building."

"Its walls about the walls of Eaton's store and should the latter be demolished, it is possible 188 Yonge Street could not stand alone without a great deal of expense," the Rankin memo states.

That Eaton's store will eventually be demolished, for the complex, as will the Reitman's at 188 Yonge St. for Phase 1 of the Eaton's project.

To date, however, no demolition has been applied for the 188 Yonge property, according to records in the city department of buildings.

DENVER (CUP) — Warning to students:

Cramming for exams may be hazardous to your health, according to a study by medical students at Volgograd in the Soviet Union.

The medics measured the pulse rates and electrocardiograms of students who were ill-prepared for their tests and found the pulse rates of students who had crammed were raised to levels of up to 180 beats a minute, and that intense nervous strain persisted throughout the exam and for a long time after.

The study concluded that too much cramming for exams might actually shorten a person's life.

Four courses is full-time: Faculty Council

By MIKE EDWARDS

A declaration that four courses can constitute full-time study became the jewel of the evening during Monday's General Committee meeting of the Faculty Council or Arts and Science.

The motion passed while the committee was breezing through 35 lines of Berlyne Committee recommendations. A total of 20 courses is still needed for a four-year B.A., and the normal course load is still considered five per year.

Other recommendations the general committee handled included a definition of a Liberal Arts Program, a clause making registration in a specific program non-mandatory and a section about taking extra courses in the summer.

The Berlyne report was released last spring in a cloud of confusion, some of which has yet to be lifted. It deals in matters both academic and administrative.

The committee passed by a large margin another recommendation that would make registration in a certifiable program unnecessary as long as pre-requisites and co-requisites are met.

However in limited enrollment courses students in certifiable programs may get priority if the course is over enrolled.

A liberal arts committee was established to set up a program, name counsellors and certify programs.

The council accepted the Berlyne report in the spring and organized a sub-committee, chaired by Dean Joan Foley, to implement academic sections of the report in legalistic terms.

The most controversial issue of the evening was recommendation 28. It states that "students registered in four or more courses in the Winter session will be regarded as in full-time attendance".

However the same recommendation insists that "five courses is regarded as the normal load for full-time study." There is also provision for taking six or seven courses in one year.

An alternative proposal was circulated that provides the same sort of scheme but which called for elaborate appeal procedures.

However the meeting voted 40-32 to consider the first proposal rather than the second.

Those speaking for the second proposal were mainly worried about the increased administrative hassles involved in getting money from the government and the possibility that students in their fourth year would not have enough credits for a four year degree.

New College principal Don Ivey was particularly anxious about this point and ended up convincing himself to vote against the four course requirement with or without the special appeal procedure.

Other forces were countered on the left side of the Simcoe Hall council chamber by Professor Daniels. He pointed out that all of the arguments on the issue had been essentially economic.

"We should look at this from the standpoint of the students and we should restrict ourselves to a debate on academic matters," he said.

He defended the case for students dropping to four courses if it meant that they would do better academically. Fine Arts prof. Fred Winter supported the students and was concerned about "the terrible waste when students cannot complete their programme."

The chief of the Faculty, Dean Bob Greene, tried to placate the more entrenched fellows on the council by giving a left-handed salute to student co-operation in these matters.

"Students tend to choose what is defined as a normal course load," he assured everyone. Besides, he countered "no one can answer some of the questions being asked."

He used the figures from Scarborough College where there seemed to be on appreciable drop away from the normal course load. Scarborough college adopted the four course provision last year.

The meeting also considered the recommendation that full-time students can take extra courses in the summer.

Food survey says ham and cheese is safest

There's a lot of difference between the choice of food in various parts of campus, and some places fare worse than others, according to a report prepared by Food Science students Corazon Dandan, Gail Low and Shirley Jansen.

For example, if you're eating in Massey College, you'd be well advised to push the plate away and read further. Your menu was designed not by someone who had much experience, but by "a porter who has no dietary qualifications but has some early connection with the Massey family."

Breathe easier if you're eating at St. Mikes. Your food was selected by a manager with 18 years' experience who's also taken a summer course at Cornell. That of course doesn't say anything about quality.

The report, prepared in co-operation with SAC and some Food Sciences teachers, is one of the three to be released shortly which seem to refute claims made by some university administrators that the Food Science faculty isn't up to par with its research.

The three reports comprise the most intensive examination of the food situation at U of T ever made — far more intensive than any investigations previously carried out by the university administration.

The Governing Council debates a proposal tomorrow which if passed would wipe out Food Sciences as presently constituted and split up its teaching and research teams among some newly created departments.

In their study, Dandan, Low and Jansen conclude that most of the menus at campus eating places "appeared to meet the requirements of Canada's Food Guide except that they were often deficient in fruits and vegetables."

However, they noted that "the growing emphasis on convenience foods offered in vending machines leads to concern regarding the possibility that students may replace regular meals with too many nutritionally undesirable snacks."

Regardless of what type of contract is arranged with the food supplier, the university administration is guaranteed a percentage of the profits.

Another study, prepared by Margaret Duncan Heyworth, surveyed 370 undergraduates and indicated that about 60 per cent bought their lunches at campus cafeterias.

Most popular locations were the Medical Sciences cafeteria, then Vic, the Arbor Room and the Trinity Buttery scoring poorly on the rating scale were the Innis and Vic snack bars plus Sir Daniel Wilson residence dining hall.

About 25 per cent of the students surveyed continue to use the catering trucks that park outside campus buildings in spite of continual harassment from university officials and Metro police. The Huron Groceteria, behind the Robarts Library, is also very popular.

Heyworth reports that, in general, women eat more vegetables, salads and non-citrus fruits than do men plus drink more tea and coffee but drink less milk.

Men tend to eat bread and meat. The difference in eating habits may be a result of "a desire by women to control their calorie intake...or select the different attitudes and lifestyles of women," Heyworth concluded.

The immortal sandwich, staple of most students' lunches, was the topic of the third study, compiled by Brenda Hamilton and Dwight Sawyer.

After hours of weighing, tasting, analyzing, and even smelling literally hundreds of sample sandwiches from most campus food outlets, they concluded that buying a sandwich on campus is somewhat like taking a chance on a racehorse. Sometimes you win and most times you lose.

As many as 36 per cent of the sandwiches were rated as "poor" but there appeared to be very few differences in quality and amount of filling between the slices when caterers were compared to the non-caterer food sources.

If you must take a chance, the study indicates that ham and cheese is your best bet with a "good" rating of 74 per cent, with ham, egg and then cheese following in that order.

Ross Flowers, who as SAC vice-president last year initiated the research into campus food and eating habits, praised the three studies as "an example of the high quality of valuable research data that the Faculty of Food Sciences is capable of producing."

"I'm certain the administration will be taking a hard look at the results the students have produced and the whole project shows that last year SAC was justified in investing so much money in this idea."

"It should also force the anti-Food Sciences lobby within Simcoe Hall to re-think their current attempts to wipe out the faculty at this time."

Academic Affairs passes the buck

In a closed-door session yesterday, Academic Affairs committee passed the buck to Governing Council tomorrow to decide if there will be a parity subcommittee of Academic Affairs to discuss student representation.

The proposal for a subcommittee came out of the November 6 meeting of Academic Affairs disrupted by students who demanded that students be given parity in hiring, firing, staffing and tenure committees.

Yesterday's Academic Affairs meeting was to have selected subcommittee members in secret but instead no action was taken.

The committee instead decided to wait for Governing Council to approve the formation of the committee first as is recommended by council executive committee.

If Governing Council does approve the recommendation, there is no indication whether Academic Affairs will select subcommittee members behind closed doors.

Committee chairman J. E. Dove recommended to the executive committee that the subcommittee's membership be drawn exclusively from Academic Affairs members who are students and faculty on a parity basis.

Dove's recommendations also includes the rider that while the subcommittee is to consider the method by which parity on staffing committees may be achieved it does not obligate Academic Affairs to a parity policy.

Such a policy decision would be a separate decision, Dove indicates.

The saga of the subcommittee's fate in committee and council contrasts to the initial creation of the subcommittee proposal in Academic Affairs earlier this month.

The November 6 meeting came to a grinding halt at the point the committee was to consider implementing the Forster report on academic appointments, which calls for no student participation in staffing committees.

A group of students stood up and announced the meeting would not proceed. In the ensuing ad hoc debate, a motion by Scarborough principal Ralph Campbell to set up the subcommittee managed to pass.

SAC president Bob Anderson has said such a parity subcommittee is how he would like to see the issue of student parity resolved.

Push-pull in colleges

By DOUG KELK

U of T president John Evans presented publicly for the first time his proposals for change in the role of federated colleges at the U of T yesterday.

Before a sympathetic audience of about 100 at Scarborough College, Evans sketched the broad outlines of the proposals which, if accepted, would be implemented over the next two or three years.

The basis of his recommendations involves the formation of a university department for each college subject. The staff of the university department will consist of all members of the colleges teaching a given subject.

In answer to questions about a shift toward centralization, Evans said: "There are opposite movements involved here. While there is centralization of resource management, decentralization is present in that the planning of courses will be made by colleges and the student will be afforded the opportunity for more flexibility in making up his course schedule."

Evans emphasized the advantages of cross-appointing professors in related fields as a positive feature of the plan.

Criticism was heard from a faculty member at Scarborough concerning the loss of sense identity with a college suffered by a professor who shifts from one college to another.

Evans said he sympathized with the dilemma, indicating a "merry-go-round" would be avoided and pointed to the weakened sense of identity for their college under the present system.

It was suggested by a Scarborough faculty member that since the enrolment at Scarborough had increased so much, the college should be given more influence in decision-making with reference to the proposed plan.

Evans promptly pointed out that both Scarborough and Erindale colleges were being funded by the St. George campus revenues and would be for the next few years.

Students can scuttle discipline code

The Cadario-Conway discipline code will be considered at tomorrow afternoon's Governing Council meeting and the Students' Administrative Council, the Graduate Students' Union, and all eight student governments are encouraging students to attend the meeting en masse to voice their disapproval of the code.

In the past, only such confrontation tactics have forced the university administration to back down and change its position. And the student organization-funded booklet circulated this week listed three cases in recent memory where confrontation aided students:

- the attempt to exclude undergraduate students from the stacks of the Roberts Library in early 1972,

- the firing of three math professors considered excellent teachers by their students in the spring of 1973,

- the administration's refusal to support day-care facilities in campus in March 1970.

Only through united action can students successfully throw back the unjust and repressive discipline code.

One disastrous result of such a code would be that "although students are to sit on disciplinary tribunals deciding guilt or innocence, they will have no say over penalties assessed; that's left up to the administration to determine." The Cadario-Conway code is a joke.

As the student pamphlet asks: "Why are students being asked to sit in judgement on fellow students when they have no power to determine offences or to shape the conditions which give rise to disciplinary problems?" The answer should be obvious to most students. Tribunals are necessary for discipline tribunals for the same reason that students are necessary to the Governing Council and its committees—they legitimize the bodies in the eyes of students (because there are real students on these bodies) without really giving any power to the student voice. This is worse than a joke, it's a farce.

However, students should be warned of the administration's decision to table the motion at the Governing Council meeting tomorrow. The administration is not as stupid as it sometimes acts.

Using the excuse that there would be no vote taken on the discipline proposals and procedures at tomorrow's meeting (to allow time for further debate), Internal Affairs committee chairman Marnie Palkin is merely trying to avoid a confrontation with students; and she knows she can do this by holding over the vote until the December Governing Council meeting when most students are either writing exams or essays or have left the university.

It's one of the administration's best tricks, and the problem is that it works. The contentious code, for example, was adopted by the Governing Council in June after students had left the university for the summer, and it only appeared in its final form last April—really too late in the year for students to respond.

Now, Conway and Palkin want to have further discussion to appease students. But, as usual there's method to their madness, and a quiet December Governing Council meeting would suit them just fine.

Does the administration's delaying tactic mean that it agrees with the demands of students to reject the code? We think not, based on past experience. What it does mean, however, is that, after refusing to do so in the past, the administration wants to re-enter into "negotiations" with the students. They want a code that is acceptable to students. And they have spent a reported $300,000 looking for such a code.

So, the move to reject the code would set a dangerous and expensive precedent. Without a structure to "negotiate" about, the administration would have to attempt to justify the existence of any code at all. Since we have been scratching our heads to excess on the question of why we need a code of behaviour, we would like to see the administration come up with some good arguments. Perhaps the big debate between Jill Conway and SAC president Bob Anderson tomorrow will enlighten us all.

Anyway, the students should express their feelings to the Governing Council that the code is illegitimate and should be rejected. There's no need to debate the question: the issue is quite simple: WE DON'T WANT IT! Anything less than rejection (that is, referring or tabling the code) is simply a ploy to give them more time.

The Governing Council must be forced to deal with the student demands directly or face the exposure of being an unrepresentative and illegitimate body.

Even people who usually don't have much to say hate the discipline code.

Progress is slow for non-academic women

Over six and a half months ago the university administration began an investigation that probably exposed it to unexpected embarrassment. We're talking about the study undertaken by Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway and Governing Council member Gwen Russell on "non-academic women: appointment, promotion and salary inequities and anomalies."

The wheels of progress grind slowly around this community known as the university, and nothing could so readily demonstrate the university in action than the non-academic women study. In early October, at a meeting of the Business Affairs committee, it was decided that a sub-committee of both the Internal Affairs and the Business Affairs committees be appointed to consider the issues and make changes. The sub-committee is due to report back to Business Affairs on December 4 and we hope their recommendations, in light of the policy issues, won't amount to a whitewash of the real matter at hand: economic and social discrimination of men over women at the university.

Conway noted at the Business Affairs meeting that "there was no wish to indicate that existing employment policies were unusual in our society, rather that the university should attempt to be more progressive in this regard."

That's all fine and good but it involves the university resolving certain inherent contradictions that it shares with society at large, outside of the sheltered atmosphere of academia. First, there's the attitude of those in positions of power toward women — it appears to be typical of what we would expect to find in society.

The report submitted in September on non-academic women indicated that "although there appear to be many promotional opportunities open to women, the failure of the university to encourage 'career development' for its staff results in a practical barrier being erected in the path of many women and their desire to move upward within the university." But it would be ludicrous to suggest that the appointed sub-committee would be able to remedy this societal problem. The best it can hope to do is patch up the existing holes and paper over the visible cracks in the university edifice. It doesn't really attack the problem of discrimination against women at this university.

The report also noted that "the classification descriptions are written in a manner which does not take account of the exercise of responsibility on the part of women non-academic staff....Thus the job description system appears to assign responsibility to males regardless of the actual disposition of duties carried out by non-academic staff women. A bias in the job description system is also apparent in the degree to which top-paying jobs are those which are normally 'male' jobs."

The one bright spot in the report lies in its suggestion that: "the university's policy of reflecting 'outside' salary scales and following 'outside' practices in its classification scheme should be replaced by a bold attempt to move away from sex-typing in job classification and to take up a position of leadership in the area of employment practices."

The university administration still operates like a corporate boardroom, even though it allows "non-shareholders in power" such as students to grace its presence at the various committees of the Governing Council. But we fail to understand the need for so much secrecy.

Tomorrow's 4 pm meeting of the Governing Council will remain in camera to discuss the budget, only opening its doors at 5 pm to the general university public, and that's understandable, although not condonable. In fact, the university keeps most of its relevant material tucked away in its files, bearing the "confidential" trademark. We've often wondered what defined a document as confidential—that is, whose terms of reference are being used (the question is obviously rhetorical).

We also came across an interesting contradiction in information flow recently. Whereas Metro Council and the other

However, as progressive as the suggestion is, we should recognize that it only solves part of the problem — the economic side. The social part of the problem — recognition by males that females are indeed capable of doing the same work with the same quality, will only come about through a massive change in the way we think and act in our society. We seriously doubt that the university can really effect those changes through reform. Such an attitude would take constant struggle and reinforcement and unless the university is prepared to compensate for the male bias in our society through educational programs to break down discriminatory stereotypes it only goes part way to solving the problem.

Gov Council-Top Secret?

various committees at City Hall release most of their committee documents in advance, the trusting folks at Simcoe Hall have decided that they will not release background papers to the press (even to their own press, the Bulletin) until the day of the committee. These aren't confidential or "restricted" documents, so we really can't understand why information is being so zealously guarded. It says something about the university's new policy of "openness."

In fact, when we asked David Claringbold, Secretary of the Governing Council, even he didn't know why background documentation couldn't be released to the campus press—he chose to pass the buck on to the Governing Council chairman Mallam Harding, who, apparently, makes decision on the circulation of materials. U of T bureaucracy unlimted.

The irony of the whole situation is that yesterday we received a publicity release from the Internal Affairs office, which was, apparently, advance information. It's a neat trick if you can pull it off. Sime Hall sends the campus media what it wants them to publicize and then withholds—we think suppress is a more realistic term to use—what it doesn't want most people to read about, like the 188 Yonge St. fiasco, for example. The "information system" is yet another interesting example of the university's "openness policy"...or lack of one.

We would be interested in knowing precisely why the university administration feels it is necessary to withhold information relevant to the whole community that is not of a confidential nature? Why can't the bureaucrats be given the go ahead to release material to other interested parties at the same time as the information is released to committee members?

SAC, Varsity "confused"

The recent editorial, entitled "Students Must Stop Discipline Code" reflected very well the confusions and contradictions in the policies pursued by SAC and the Varsity editors. It would be impossible to give a comprehensive critique of this editorial in a short letter, but two points are easily made.

The writer refers to the "unrepresentative students on U of T's Governing Council". If these students are unrepresentative, the fault lies squarely in one-quarter, and in one quarter only, the students themselves. If the students have been unable to elect suitable representatives to the Governing Council, what basis do we have for confidence in their ability to elect representative participants in a situation in which they have greater power than at present?

The writer also asserts flatly that "students should not police other students". What does the writer wish? Does he want there to be no discipline at all? Does he wish students to be policed by non-students? If he favors the latter, how can he square this with his advocacy of student participation in governing the university? If students are not willing to police themselves, this means that they are abdication responsibility for this aspect of university government, and can certainly not reasonably ask for even partial power in the university structure.

Peaceful demos are in danger

Peaceful student demonstration to support legitimate grievances is in great danger of extinction at this university. By implementing the discipline code as is, the administration will effectively destroy open negotiation between students and administration on key campus issues. In the past, these demonstrations have served to voice student opinion and have led to just policy making, i.e., unrestricted access to the Robarts Library stacks. From now on, student dissent will be dealt with under the vague terms of the Code, in the privacy of Governing Council Committees.

Students have no real say on the punishment of "offenders" of the code, as the tribunal, on which students will sit, does not set sentence. This will be handled by the Governing Council, a non-parity university body. The vagueness of the wording in vital sections of the code effectively puts any university administrator, a private citizen, above the law in deciding what constitutes undue disruption of U of T affairs. Thus a student could be brought before the tribunal for sitting in on a peaceful demonstration for committing an "unlawful" act.

Sections D(3); (b), (e) and (f) of the code allow administrators the "right" to dissolve any student demonstration if he/she feels normal affairs are being interrupted. Just by exercising this "right", whether just or not, the administration can dissolve the effectiveness of any future demonstration as it could be "legally" disbanded and its participants faced with expulsion. Is this due process of law?

At best, this document only deals with the symptoms of the problem of university-wide discipline. It makes no attempt, and neither have the administrators, i.e., Governing Council, to get to the root of the problem; student-faculty parity on decision-making bodies within the University of Toronto especially on a discipline committee, if one is to be formed, to mete out penalties to offenders of the code. Being a member of the Innis College Council, the only college or faculty council with parity, I know that parity does work. Students are not mindless beings interested only in destroying the workings of the university, but do infuse new and innovative ideas into the body. So far, the legislative process at Innis College has not fallen apart.

Papers such as the discipline code should be rejected by students as they only further the "almighty" power of the University administration. It's time they listened to students' demands and quit thinking of the University of Toronto as their personal domain. I condemn the discipline code and the non-student members of the Governing Council for being unjust to the students of Innis College and the university as a whole, and ask that the code and the procedures outlined within, be rejected on Thursday, November 22, 1973.

Shelly Sznokoff, president
Innis College Student Society

I am in favour of maximum student participation in university government, in every aspect, including the establishment of policies for hiring and promotion. I believe that parity is a false issue since it amounts to the assumption that a faculty vote should be counted as a multiple of a student vote depending on the accidental ratio of faculty and students in the university. In any case, parity in particular, and the amount of student representation in general, are not the difficulties that stand in the way of democratic University government. The basic obstacle to student participation is student apathy, as reflected in the fact that the last two student additions to the Governing Council were "elected" by acclamation, which simply means that they were filled by volunteers without any real contest. The government structure of the student body itself is grossly unrepresentative because of student apathy. To date, the students have not shown an ability to use the power they already possess. Historically, I do not think that it has ever happened that a group has ever acquired power when it is not utilizing the partial power it already had. The constant demands for parity accompanied by emotional and illogical arguments and attempts to organize confrontations are actually a smoke screen to hide the failure of student participation and leadership.

Kenneth O. May
Department of Mathematics

Ed. Professor May seems to be confused about the direction of our editorial. We consider Governing Council students to be unrepresentative because 1) student organizations such as the Students' Administrative Council and the Graduate Students Union are often disregarded when the Governing Council as a whole attempts to co-opt students to sit on its committees and 2) because of the way the whole parity issue was handled in the Ontario legislature in 1971. Faculty forced the government to back down under pressure to deny parity to students.

We also believe that this is why there is so much student apathy: students realize that under the present structure they have little (if not zero) power. Student apathy does have a reason for its existence, a point which Professor May has not discussed. Furthermore, students have chosen to use the power they possess in the past—through confronting the university (wildness day care, the library, etc.). This appears to be the only manner in which students can effect change until their status as second-class citizens is changed.)

struggles of the majority for their rights. And they would like nothing better than to have us draft one for them.

If the administration wants to be rid of demonstrations and occupations then it should eliminate the problems that make those actions necessary. Far from accepting any discipline codes we should continue to mount these actions for our rights, beginning with this fight, to win student-faculty-staff control of the university.

We have to turn all our energies to building a mass rally and march to the Governing Council meeting tomorrow to demand rejection of the code and all others. SAC should turn over its facilities to the struggle and to the steering committee coming out of Wednesday's meeting. We need posters, leaflets, banners and a special Varsity to advertise for Thursday's action. Discussions should be organized in classes.

Mike Edwards and Heather Riddout, SAC reps and members of U of T Young Socialists.

Discipline meeting "a step forward"

Last Wednesday's meeting on the discipline code, sponsored by SAC, APUS, and GSU was a significant step forward for students at U of T. The meeting overwhelmingly rejected the administration's Code of Behavior. This marks the beginning of an important campaign for student rights on the campus.

However, a motion put forward by the Young Socialists that students reject all discipline codes was tabled until the next mass meeting. In our opinion, this question is very important and key to our ability to fight the administration's attempt to stifle dissent on campus. Are we to defeat the present code only to sit down with the administration to write another "more liberal" one?

In the discussion of the motion SAC president Bob Anderson said that some sort of discipline code was necessary—a "just code that would protect students". He pointed to some "progressive" recommendations in the Campbell Report.

But who are students to be protected from? Certainly Bob doesn't think that students need to be protected from other students? Or from professors? Or from maintenance and service workers? Of course not. They have to be protected from the arbitrary and undemocratic actions of the administration. And we agree. That's why no code of behavior for students is necessary or desirable.

The idea that there is a need for a code of behavior to discipline the actions of students turns the problem on its head. It turns the victim into the criminal.

Students have no control over how the university is run. They have no say over what is taught or how it is taught. Student women face oppression in the university and suffer, for example, from the lack of adequate child care facilities. Students face spiraling tuition and residence costs.

But when students fight for parity as they did in '71, or for daycare as in '70 and '73, or for the right to use the library in '72, then they are considered "disruptive", "violent", "vocal and undemocratic minorities." They risk the penalty of expulsion or the blows of cops' batons.

These actions are disruptive to whom? Certainly not to students who have shown through referendum and other means their complete support for these actions. No, these actions are disruptive only to the administration which seeks to keep the university a bastion of the status-quo.

The real violent vocal and undemocratic minority on the campus is the administration—men like Adam Zimmerman who are directly connected in the Chilean coup. They are the ones who need a code of behavior. It is their actions—calling cops on campus, firing professor Salaff, sponsoring war research not day care, lord over our education, supporting tuition hikes—which are disruptive to the university. It is these actions that should be disciplined.

This discipline code, the Campbell Report, or any other discipline code the administration might be willing to adopt, could only serve to reinforce their control over the university and to brand "disruptive" the

Is this an engineer or the perpetuation of a stereotype?

Toike viciousness is not a joke

The viciousness of Toike Oike is not a joke. The anti-ethnic slander it purveys feeds social hatred and encourages violence. Moreover, the connection between this kind of pornography and the sexual pornography that deprecates women is clearly seen in Toike Oike. We should be no less outraged by its sexism than by its racism.

One wonders what the effect of the Toike Oike ethos is on the engineering students when they finally are employed. Large numbers of workers belong to the very ethnic groups that Toike Oike suggests engineers should despise. Can a person who entertains this outlook be a competent engineer? Will not the effect of his work, in the long run, be more destructive than useful to society?

And is not Toike Oike a good symbol of the fact that many engineers today see only technological and never human problems? The same students who can enjoy this verbal violence will be the ones who tomorrow will be amused when the technology they've created is used to bomb and burn and pollute and kill.

What one sees in Toike Oike is evidence of a genuine failure in the engineering curriculum at the University of Toronto. Somewhere along the way, the Toike Oike has learned that its constituency is amused at jokes that do violence to human beings and social courtesies.

Other professional schools have long since become aware that a disdain for human dignity is not reputable or socially responsible. Medical schools—including the school here at the U of T—have revised their curricula in order to educate students to a deeper sense of social problems and human values. Law and business schools have increasingly helped students become aware of the situation and claims of minority groups and have educated students to a larger sense of society.

What we see in the Toike Oike suggests to me that it is time to begin reviewing our engineering program. Where is the failure? Has it a narrow technological orientation that actually produces incompetents? Does it require major changes? Should the students be required to study in areas that help broaden them? Is the engineering faculty itself willing to undertake this self-criticism or must it be initiated from outside?

I urge that these questions be taken up by a special faculty committee, which would convene for the sake of examining the structure of the present engineering program and for making recommendations for its reorientation. Ideally this committee should include some faculty from Arts and Sciences, but the majority would come from other professional schools within the university. Members of the engineering faculty should be invited to sit with it and, through the discussions, valuable mutual enlightenment would take place.

I confess, too, that I believe a reasonable recommendation might be that engineering be abandoned as a university discipline. Obviously it is far worse to have engineers who are technically skilled but lacking in human sensitivities than to have no engineers at all.

Scar council opposes code, rejects disruption

The Scarborough College Students' Council gave SAC the old velvet-glove-on-an-iron-fist treatment in a five-hour marathon meeting Sunday and Monday evenings.

The velvet glove came when the SCSG overwhelmingly supported SAC's rejection of the university's code of behaviour and then agreed in principle to endorse the mass meeting SAC is arranging prior to tomorrow's Governing Council meeting.

However, than came the iron fist, as the Scarborough council rejected any strategy that would involve either disruption of a Governing Council meeting or the occupation of a university building "at this time." SCSG also ordered president Ross Flowers to write a strongly-worded letter to SAC indicating its anger at not being consulted over a SAC plan to spend $300 for a separate SAC office at the college.

The letter used adjectives such as "irresponsible," "unilateral," "arbitrary" and "unnecessary" in commenting on the SAC plan, which ironically was approved at last week's SAC meeting held at Scarborough.

However, the most ominous iron fist was wielded by SCSG vice-president Scott Cavalier who voiced the growing suspicion and distrust that has been building for several months between some members of both SCSG and SAC.

Cavalier, a Scarborough SAC rep, charged that at least one SAC member had welcomed "a state of war between SAC and Scarborough" during last week's SAC meeting.

"Well, I guess that means it is now time to make the war mutual, and now may I declare that this war is officially open," Cavalier said, noting that some colleges on the St. George campus are also dissatisfied with the state of relations with SAC this year.

Council approved a Cavalier motion calling for Scarborough to host a conference of all local councils in the university to "discuss matters of mutual concern and to further goodwill."

Asked whether such a conference would turn into a hate-SAC weekend, Cavalier smiled and then replied: "Let's face it, for most local councils SAC has become a matter of serious concern."

Flowers, a SAC vice-president last year, refused to comment directly on Cavalier's statements. However, he did say that "a withdrawal referendum is now a definite possibility."

Scarborough executive SAC rep John O'Donohue took strong objection to Cavalier's report on the mood of the now controversial November 14 SAC meeting at Scarborough, insisting that the alleged comment about "a state of war" was never made.

"It's simply not true," O'Donohue said in pressing Cavalier for an explanation of his anti-SAC position.

As members glared at one another, a temporary truce was declared as Cavalier and O'Donohue united in opposition to the code of behavior.

O'Donohue noted that there was no effective student input during the preparation of the discipline code and Cavalier also supported the SAC anti-code campaign.

In introducing the motion to support SAC's rejection of the code, Flowers told the council that "students cannot put their entire faith in the proposed tribunals" and that the sections on conspiracy "come close to an attempt to legislate what students are allowed to think."

However, Flowers criticized some aspects of the SAC lobbying campaign as "ridiculous in the extreme." "Surely SAC has the ability to mount an effective campaign without recourse to demonstrations and threatened occupations."

Fourth year rep Heidi Hehn called the code an arbitrary and unnecessary duplication of existing provisions of the criminal code and vice-president Andy Denver said: "A literal interpretation of the code suggests there are hundreds of crimes a student could commit every week."

The phenomenon of strange political bedfellows was also on display as card-carrying Conservative Bill Warburton and "Bob Nixon Liberal" Robert Coates united to defend the code to a skeptical audience of councillors.

"The tribunals are an adequate safeguard of students' rights, and in any case we cannot support disruptive actions which infringe on the lawful rights of other students," Warburton said. "Gross misuse of the library is a very valid reason for expulsion."

Coates called the code "moderate, useful and reasonable in light of existing conditions."

Council thought otherwise and rejected the discipline plan 12-2.

Conway explains student revolts of 1960's

By PAUL CARSON

The true character of the worldwide student revolts of the sixties cannot be understood without examining the changing character of educational institutions in rapidly industrializing capitalist societies.

So said Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway speaking on "An Historical Perspective—on the Academic Disturbances of the 1960's" to an audience of about 50 members of the University Women's Club and ten Scarborough College student politicians Monday night.

Conway observed that "Canadian students involved in occupations have tended to debate in almost Parliamentary fashion the issues at stake while this is not the case in American occupations."

Conway's hour-long talk was filled mainly with generalities and contained few specific references to the U of T situation, past or present.

She did not comment on any disruption at U of T or on the controversial code of behavior, which she co-authored with former student governor Paul Cadario now at Oxford University with a Rhodes Scholarship.

"Students have begun to ask whether the university really is a very self-fulfilling institution, and society is asking whether it really benefits from some of the very expensive programs of professional training," Conway said.

She noted studies of student revolts in Europe, North America and Asia indicate that "Students are complaining about the same things — remoteness of the university, obsession with size, bureaucracy, meritocracy." She did not say whether the complaints are justified.

In one of her few specific references to current disputes, Conway said that the rapid expansion programs of the sixties necessitated the hiring of many foreign professors. However, in a magnificent display of fence-sitting on the controversy over the Canadianization of the university, the Australian-born vice-president said that "undergraduates should have an education related to their local experience" but that in graduate school, "the quality of the scholarship is the prime concern."

Conway also defended the interdisciplinary course on women as "a valuable, flexible mechanism" that will aid more and more women to get "approved faculty credentials" in women's studies. Thus, such courses are a real assist to the growth of the women's liberation movement, she argued.

Students in the 1960's assumed the political system "exists to obscure issues for the benefit of the vested interests in society."

This led them to the conclusion that "the university could really tackle explosive political questions," Conway said, but quickly added that the university is "actually very fragile and doesn't have that much power."

She reassured her audience that many student activists of the sixties "are now willing to concede that social problems must be confronted outside the university environment."

DISCIPLINE STRUCTURES AND PROCEDURES

The following summary has been prepared to inform interested members of the University community about the Discipline Structures and Procedures now before the Governing Council. A policy document approved in principle by the Governing Council last June was the basis from which a drafting committee worked over the summer to develop a 20-page legal document outlining structures and the three schedules (22 pages) outlining procedures.

The summary attempts to highlight the differences between methods for dealing with academic and non-academic offences and to make it clear to readers how charges would be laid and sanctions would be determined in the event of a conviction.

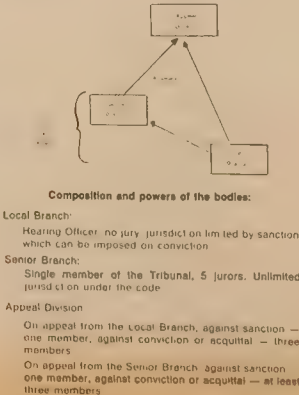

Interested individuals may obtain copies of the documents from the Office of the Governing Council after November 22, when the documents will have been brought before the full Governing Council.

Non-Academic Offences

The Non-Academic offences in the Code of Behaviour are offences of a criminal nature. In other words, the Code only purports to punish members of the University when they have committed the kind of offence which might well give rise to criminal proceedings in the ordinary courts. For this reason, the procedure that is adopted to deal with these offences is closely modelled on the usual procedure in criminal trials, though in a few situations, simpler and less expensive alternatives have been adopted where such alternatives are permitted under the Statutory Powers Procedure Act, which has been accepted as providing the minimum standards of procedural fairness.

Cases involving a non-academic offence will be initially held before one of the two bodies in the Trial Division. The diagram outlines all the academic offences. The rules proposed provide for the appointment of the members of these bodies by the Governing Council on the recommendation of the President and after joint recommendations by the Academic and Internal Affairs Committees in the case of the members of the Senior Branch and Appeal Division, and by the Chairman of the Tribunal in the case of the hearing of offences in the local branch. All members of these bodies are taken from people who are not members of the University. The powers that these various bodies can exercise are outlined in summary form in the diagram.

THE UNIVERSITY TRIBUNAL (As Applied to Non-Academic Offences)

Academic Offences

Proceedings in the case of a non-academic offence are begun by the laying of a complaint. The complaint is investigated by the Prosecutor (who is also appointed by the Governing Council on the recommendation of the President) who has to determine if there is a prima facie case that an offence has been committed. Only if the prosecutor has decided that there is such a case may the case proceed to trial. At this stage the Vice-President — Internal Affairs has the power to refuse to allow the case to go further, or if the case is to proceed, to decide in which branch of the trial division it shall be heard, for this decision will determine the maximum penalty which can be imposed. The rules proposed set out in detail the procedures which must be followed in any case. Where a jury is provided (in hearings before the Senior Branch) the jury will determine the question of guilt or innocence and will be able to recommend a penalty which will be imposed by the chairman. No jury sits in a case before the local branch. The rules also provide for appeals and the composition of the appellate bodies which is set out in the diagram. There is a possibility of a review of any decision by the Tribunal even after the appeals have been exhausted as there are exceptional circumstances which lead the tribunal to doubt whether the original decision was just and correct.

The Academic offences in the Code relate, in the case of students, to dishonest methods of obtaining standing such as by cheating or plagiarism and in the case of teaching staff, to dishonest or discriminatory methods of evaluating student work. There is a range of penalties, the most serious being expulsion and dismissal from the University.

The model adopted for the Tribunal to hear charges of academic offences is the typical criminal model of judge and jury, with the judge interpreting the Code and imposing any sentence and the jury determining questions of guilt and innocence. A departure from the typical model, however, is a provision requiring the judge to obtain the views of the jury on sentence. Because of the need for consistency of interpretation of the Code and other relevant law, the importance of a knowledge of law and legal procedures. Interpretation is required to be in the hands of a legally qualified individual acting as judge. The composition of the jury is either three students and two members of the teaching staff or three members of the teaching staff and two students, at the option of the person accused.

A second departure from the typical model is provided for in the case of charges against students where a lesser penalty than expulsion or long-term suspension is being asked for by the prosecution, and where only one division of the University is concerned. A less formal trial, still with a "judge" (called a Hearing Officer) and jury, but without legal counsel representing either the prosecution or the accused will be possible at the local divisional level. If the student prefers to have counsel, he or she need not accept the local form of trial, but because some may prefer to avoid the expense of counsel (and to require the prosecution to be conducted on the same basis) provision is made for this possibility.

There is, of course, an automatic right of appeal from decisions at either the local or University trial level. The ultimate appeal tribunal consists of legally qualified persons (not including the one who presided at the trial).

Any student member of the teaching staff or member of the administrative staff having reason to believe an offence has been committed may lodge a complaint. Initially this will have to be to the relevant Dean or department chairman, although a complainant dissatisfied with a decision not to prosecute may require that the matter be referred to the Vice-President and also to the University Prosecutor, an independent official who will give an opinion as to whether there is a case that warrants prosecution.

Tenured members of the teaching staff have a contractual right, which the University does not have the legal right to alter unilaterally, to have any decision that they should be dismissed for misconduct heard by a committee established under the Policy Statement on Academic Tenure (the "Heard Rules"). Thus where a decision to seek dismissal is made the case will come before such a committee, rather than before the Tribunal. Where a lesser penalty is sought, however, the University Tribunal will hear the case.

The federal government is at long last beginning to think twice about supplying the United States' thirst for natural fuels.

Canada depletes non-renewable resources, conservation becomes necessary to survive

By François Bregha

"Stop the world, I want to get off!" If there is any one person in Canada who must now be thinking that, it is Donald Macdonald, our beleaguered Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In a year of already unprecedented turmoil in the field of energy policy, there is no sign yet of a return to a more stable equilibrium. On the contrary, after a short interlude of relative quiet at the beginning of October, the pace of events quickened once more towards the end of last month.

The last seven days in October formed another one of those event-packed weeks where developments seemed to out-pace each other at a dizzying speed. The week started off auspiciously enough with an apparent reconciliation between Alberta and Ottawa. In an effort to improve the relations between the two governments — relations which had cooled considerably since Ottawa's unilateral imposition of an export tax on Canadian crude oil which Alberta had protested vigorously — Macdonald made three substantial concessions. He promised that:

- Canadian oil prices would be repegged to international levels after the end of the price freeze on January 31,
- natural gas prices, which are now below market value, will be allowed to rise and meet oil prices. (And remember that it was Alberta's insistence on higher gas prices which precipitated the court confrontation with Ontario.)
- finally, the export tax on Canadian crude going to the United States would soon be rescinded in favour of a marketing board, as advocated by the Alberta government.

In addition, a meeting in Edmonton between Alberta premier Peter Lougheed and Macdonald was set for mid-November. Alberta's Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Don Getty, was understandably satisfied with Ottawa's stand: "We found a pretty co-operative attitude that was not nearly as evident before. We're pretty pleased."

After the dangerous confrontation in September which had threatened to escalate into a full-blown constitutional crisis, it seemed that Alberta and the federal government had at last reached a compromise.

But that was on October 29. Four days later, the gulf between Alberta and Ottawa was greater than ever. Acting more like a sovereign state than a province in Confederation, Alberta 'broke off relations' with the federal government and at one point even threatened to curtail oil deliveries to the domestic market. (Alberta has since promised to do everything possible to supply the Canadian market first, even at the cost of reducing oil shipments to the States.)

What had happened? On November 1, the day before Alberta broke off all energy negotiations with Ottawa, Macdonald read a long-awaited statement in the House of Commons. Heralded as a major policy pronouncement, the suspense pervading the capital was heightened when the delivery of the speech was delayed twice in the same day, supposedly to wait for the closure of the stock markets.

We know now, however, that the real reason for postponement was internal dissension within the Cabinet. Apparently, the morning of the speech, Macdonald had submitted to his colleagues a proposal for the creation of a National Petroleum Company which entailed the acquisition of Shell Oil or Gulf Canada. This suggestion was turned down by the right-wing elements in the Cabinet who were reported to have objected to government competition to private enterprise.

Once expurgated of this timid adventure into state ownership of Canada's resources, the rest of the speech was quite bland. As expected, Macdonald announced gasoline price hikes east of the Ottawa Valley; he also mentioned that the price freeze for the rest of Canada would be retained and, more important, that the export tax on oil would be raised almost five-fold to $1.90.

The only real surprise, apart from the size of the tax increase, was that Ottawa was sticking to its oil price freeze west of the Ottawa Valley. It had been widely expected that the well-organized oil lobby—which has been strengthened considerably over the past few months—would have succeeded in persuading the government to increase the wellhead price for Alberta oil to bring it in line with the price of imported oil at Montreal. Indeed, on the stock market, oil shares rose appreciably before the announcement in anticipation of such a move; they lost over 20 points on the Toronto Stock Exchange the next day.

"This American president of that American corporation has set this House a good example of bad corporate citizenship".

Donald Macdonald, in the House of Commons, rebuking Jerry McAfee, president of Gulf Oil of Canada for having increased gasoline prices during the freeze.

It is unfortunate that Alberta's dramatic response to Ottawa's increase of the export tax monopolized the public's attention after Macdonald's speech. The media also seemed more interested in following the verbal exchanges between the two protagonists than in analyzing the substance of the speech itself.

The policy proposals which Macdonald outlined on November 1 illustrate Ottawa's incapacity to grasp the real dimensions of the energy problem and recommend effective solutions to deal with it. If we concentrate on the oil question, we find that Ottawa has failed in two instances: supply and prices.

Little flexibility in the short run

Short of officially declaring its support for the Arab cause in the Middle East, there is relatively little that the federal government can do in the short run to assure secure supplies for the eastern half of the country now dependent on imported oil.

Of the crude coming into Canada, 53 per cent comes from Venezuela, 14 per cent from Iran, eight per cent from western Africa and 25 per cent from the Middle East. In their attempt to put pressure on the Western world—and thus on Israel—the Arab gulf states have cut back oil production by 25 per cent, and, in the case of three countries (the United States, Holland and Portugal), halted oil shipments altogether.

Although the Arab countries are now intimating that they may not cut production any lower since it could prove counter-productive politically, it is estimated that Canada will still suffer a deficit of approximately 10 million barrels of oil this winter. To avoid the politically distasteful possibility of having to ration available supplies, Ottawa has now gone into the direct purchase of petroleum through the Canadian Commercial Corporation and has already procured over one million barrels of heating oil on the international market—although at substantially higher prices. An old pipeline to Ottawa is also being reactivated to carry refined Alberta oil to the capital.

The situation, however, is still far from stable since Canada looms as a potential victim of an escalation in the Arab oil war against the United States. The Arab countries are already refusing to ship their oil destined to Montreal via the Portland, Maine, pipeline. In winter, when Montreal is icebound, the pipeline becomes extremely important. Moreover, there remains the possibility of an Arab threat to stop all oil shipments to eastern Canada if Canada in turn does not stop its oil exports to the United States.

The only significant source of supply remaining therefore are the Alberta Tar Sands. Geologists agree that as many as 300 billion barrels of oil may ultimately be recovered from these bituminous sands (our total reserves of conventional crude amount to less than 10 billion barrels) although present technology gives us immediate access to only 65 billion barrels.

However, several important problems associated with the development of these Tar Sands have not yet been solved. One of these is the environmental problem. The Tar Sands are presently accessible only through open-pit mining, a process which may scar the landscape permanently. Huge settling ponds—each approximately nine square miles in size—will be needed and even then, it is feared that enough silt would escape into nearby rivers to upset their ecological balance. The high sulphur content of the oil being mined poses yet another serious environmental problem.

Another serious disadvantage of the Tar Sands is their very high cost. It costs about $800 million and takes four years to bring one of these plants into operation.

In the hypothetical case that, by 1983, Canada were to rely exclusively on the Tar Sands to satisfy its oil needs, 20 plants, each producing 125,000 barrels a day—the present economic size—would be required, for a staggering total cost of $16 billion. Right now, only two such plants are under consideration and they will not come on stream until the end of the decade.

Canada suffers from dependency on a foreign supplier

A massive development programme will thus be called for to meet the anticipated oil demand in the early 1980's. It is not clear, however, whether such an effort could indeed be undertaken successfully: there exist huge problems in raising and spending $16 billion in such a relatively short period of time if, as is likely, the Tar Sands have to compete for capital with other projects such as a Mackenzie Pipeline ($5 billion), a pipeline from the Arctic ($5 billion), Ontario Hydro's nuclear programme ($4 billion), etc. It is also interesting to note that Syncrude, the consortium that will operate the first commercial Tar Sands plants, has asked its competitor, Shell Canada, to postpone its plant construction because of the unavailability of the human and technical resources needed to build two plants simultaneously.

"I think the so-called energy crisis is an exaggeration of the true situation.... The energy resources are there and it is just a matter of gearing up to produce the energy we require".

Roy Bennett, president of Ford Motor Co. of Canada.

It is not surprising, therefore, that some experts are predicting that Canada will be importing one million barrels of oil a day west of the Ottawa Valley by 1985. We are now painfully aware of the costs of dependency on a foreign supplier. In little over a decade, that dependency may be doubled. What will be the repercussions? On the security of supply in case of another war in the Middle East? On our balance of payments if oil prices continue their steep rise?

It is clear that Canada will face serious supply difficulties in the not-too-distant future. Yet, with the myopia characteristic of Ottawa's recent energy pronouncements, Macdonald's November 1 speech does not look beyond this winter. In a crunch situation, the government's weak-kneed approach illustrates dramatically the depths of Canada's energy crisis:

- With not even the pretense of a comprehensive energy policy, Ottawa keeps groping desperately for solutions as crises occur

- The government has not yet grasped the complexity of our crisis and, therefore, tries to solve the problem by treating its symptoms: shortages will not go away with higher prices, token conservation measures and huge investments in the energy sector. The only realistic solution in the long run lies in preventing energy demand from doubling every 15 years

- Continuing to maintain an Olympian aloofness in handing down its policy decisions, Ottawa has aggravated the rift between itself and Alberta and Ottawa, however, is not without 'solutions' to our present and any future shortages. These 'solutions' fall into two broad categories: increased investment in the energy sector and rising prices. They both suffer from the distinct disadvantage, however, of potentially proving worse than the problem itself. Indeed, they not only demonstrate once more an unimaginative and exceedingly narrow approach to remedying shortages, but they also dangerously undermine the national interest.

If we address ourselves to the first solution, we see that despite the warnings contained in Limits to Growth, Ottawa continues to believe in the dogma of endlessly increasing supply to satisfy an insatiable demand. What economic repercussions may we expect from a vastly enlarged investment in the energy sector?

In its voluminous energy analysis published in June, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources outlined possible development op-

Trudeau watches in amazement as his plan for federalism takes yet another step.

It's the old shell game and Canada is losing once again.

Black long-run outlook

But if the government has little room to manoeuvre in the immediate future, such is not the case as one expands the time horizon. And here we find that our present crisis in supply may recede into insignificance when compared to what may occur in 10 years.

It is true that in the next two to five years our situation will brighten considerably for awhile. Canadian exports of oil will decrease, the InterProvincial Pipe Line will have been extended to Montreal, thus eliminating our dependency on the Middle East, and the Syncrude project in the Alberta Tar Sands will be coming on stream.

Will this be enough to avert shortages by 1983? Consider the following facts. Canadian conventional oil reserves have been dropping for the last three years and will now run out in 12 years at present rates of consumption. But since consumption is increasing by four per cent per year, we can expect these reserves to be depleted in 10 years instead. Forecasts of Canadian oil demand by 1983 range between 2.5 and 2.7 million barrels a day. Where will the oil come from?

The Canadian Petroleum Association (CPA)—representing the oil industry in Canada—has long been infamous for its inflated estimates of our potential oil reserves. Operating under unrealistic assumptions, the CPA has calculated that Canada possesses the staggering potential of over 120 billion barrels of oil (excluding the Tar Sands). The CPA's propaganda has had the unfortunate impact of dulling Canadians into a false sense of security about the vastness of the resources claimed for this country. The pernicious influence of these statistics can be seen in the widely-held belief that these potential reserves do in fact exist—they merely have to be located.

"This country's entire energy policy is based on the principle of producing and selling our known reserves as fast as possible, preferably to the United States, in the complete assurance that these reserves will quickly be replaced by much greater ones".

Dr. Ken North, Professor of Geology, Carleton University.

This, however, is completely untrue. There is no guarantee that more than a fraction of these 'reserves' will ever be recovered, indeed, exploration efforts in the Arctic and in the east coast offshore where the bulk of these reserves is claimed—have so far yielded very disappointing results: no commercial oil strikes have yet been made. Given the long lead time required to bring the oil to market once it is found, it may not be unreasonable to conclude that little—if any—that oil will serve the Canadian market by 1983. Where then will the 2.5 million barrels that will be needed come from?

We could reduce exports. Canada presently exports about 50 per cent of its oil production. However, it is unlikely that we can extend the life index of our reserves very much by cutting back on our exports since such a reduction would most likely be offset by the extension of the domestic market to Montreal which is now receiving foreign crude.

tions to 1980. The 'Maximum Development' option, assuming, as its name implies, lavish and unprecedented expenditures in the energy sector, was estimated to cost $68 billion. (In the 1960's, Canada spent only $19 billion in energy.) The authors of the energy analysis, however, voiced some severe reservations as to the desirability of this option. They wrote:

"The large incremental investment expenditures required for the Maximum Development case have a substantial impact on the economy... Even with some slack in the economy there is severe stress of the country's capacities. The rates of price increases as the decade closes are unacceptable... The adoption of this program... would necessitate a substantial reallocation of both human and capital resources."

An Energy Policy for Canada, Volume I, page 219.

Scarcely four months after the release of this document, at a Liberal constituency meeting in Toronto on November 7, Macdonald stated that Canada will spend not $68 billion, but $100 billion in the next 10 years!

If the assessment of the potential economic impact of the Maximum Development option is correct, then how much more severe will be the consequences of spending a sum 33 per cent larger? In an effort to keep up with the American standard of living, we may not only reap the same problems but also bankrupt the country and lose permanently the opportunity to diversify our economy.

The second solution: high prices

The second remedy Ottawa advances as a cure to our ills is the old neo-classical economic solution of raising prices: higher prices it is argued not only decrease demand by encouraging the conservation of energy, they also increase supply by providing an incentive for the development of our resources. Applied to, however, this proposal, the integrated multi-national energy system.

Chicago price; they would be pegged to world prices.

In the short term, however, this new policy may hurt the Canadian consumer as much as the oil one. Since the beginning of the year, Venezuela has increased its oil prices 10 times, the last time a whopping 56 per cent. Furthermore, there is now some speculation that international oil prices will continue to increase very rapidly for the next year. By 1975, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) knows that its bargaining position will weaken as reserves from Prudhoe Bay and the North Sea come on stream. Do Canadians from coast to coast have to pay these exorbitant prices because of the animosity between Arab countries and the United States?

1971: $53,775,000
Percentage Increase 1970-71: 37 per cent

Canadians will get an indication of just how fast oil prices will rise when the government freeze on crude is lifted on January 31. Present estimates place the jump in prices on February 1 at $2. a barrel, a 50 per cent increase overnight.

One must remember of course that the justification for allowing prices to rise is to give industry the incentive to develop more expensive sources of fuel, such as the Tar Sands. Present prices have long ceased to reflect the actual costs of production. It is indeed enlightening to examine the cost of extracting one barrel of oil in Alberta, as calculated by the industry's magazine, and compare it to the present price of Canadian oil ($4):

Alberta crude average/barrel

Exploration	.30 development/drilling	.10
land	.21
producing facilities	.13
lifting	.27
royalties	.31
taxes	.16

$1.48

(Note: Royalties have been increased by the Alberta Government since these figures were calculated.)

Multinationals' profits keep growing

Is it surprising to learn then that the petroleum industry's profits this year will increase by 40 to 50 per cent according to the Financial Post? Internationally, the position of the "majors", as the great multinational oil companies are referred to, is even better. Despite OPEC, despite the American energy crisis, their profits have doubled since 1970!

"You have got to find some kind of a standard to attract capital into continued development of the resources. The big money will come in to invest if they can get the same buck from investment in oil resources in Canada that they could get from the North Sea or Louisiana or elsewhere."

Donald Macdonald, as quoted in the Toronto Star, November 2, 1973.

What do higher oil prices mean for the Canadian economy? Not only are consumers penalized to the benefit of the oil industry, but, moreover, according to a recent study at the University of Alberta, "there is a net loss to the Canadian economy equal to 7.73 per cent of the price increment" each time the price of oil goes up. Bruce Wilkinson and Frank Roseman, who conducted the study, state that:

"the higher prices Canadian consumers pay for the foreigndominated oil industry more than offset the royalties and corporate taxes our governments receive as well as the share of dividends or retained earnings due to Canadian shareholders in the industry".

Thus, as Canadian oil prices increase, not only does the economy suffer more in absolute terms, but in relative terms, the Energy Analysis of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources indicates that it may even suffer proportionately more:

"It is interesting to note that with the present federal royalty and tax system, the efficiency of rent collection decreases with higher oil and gas selling prices.... If the prices were to increase very strongly in the future, then the efficiency would drop to less than 50 per cent".

An Energy Policy for Canada, Vol. 1 page 219. This regressive tax system, in itself, must provide an incentive to increase prices!

We have seen that Canada, the only industrialized country in the western world with the ability of being self-sufficient in energy, will soon suffer the worst of two worlds: not only will energy prices rise astronomically in the future, but shortages look inevitable as well. It would be simplistic to blame the federal government alone for this aberration. Clearly, Alberta's historical insistence on the 'firesale' of her resources as well as the multinationals' greed for profit have all contributed to this sorry state of affairs.

What, then, is the solution to the scarcity of supply? Clearly, it is not the present policy of increasing prices and accelerating investment in the energy sector. The only viable long run solution lies in the conservation of energy and the nationalization of the energy sector.

As mentioned earlier, the consumption of energy cannot continue to be allowed to double every 15 years. Indeed, there is something fundamentally wrong in extrapolating present rates of demand far into the future and then striving mightily to develop the sources of supply needed to meet that demand.

Instead of operating under this self-fulfilling prophecy, Canada should adopt rather the opposite principle: stand the equation on its head and calculate an "allowable energy expenditure", taking into account environmental, social, political and economic factors, and tailoring the demand to meet the available supply.

Why nationalize the energy industry? Because the industry encourages growth. Once a new oil field is found, it becomes imperative to exploit it immediately to recover the investment in exploration and development. Thus, although Canada will not likely need Arctic gas until the mid-eighties, it is probable that a pipeline will be built by the end of the decade to carry that gas to market (mainly, the US). A National Petroleum Company would not feel the same compulsion to recover its investment.

But more important is the question of who shall control Canada's energy resources. The petroleum industry is avowedly continentalist and as such works against Canada's best interests. How long can Canada continue to function effectively with a powerful "fifth column" undermining official policies at every opportunity?

The question of the control and ownership of our resources is one which Canadians have not yet confronted. Now is the time to do so, when Canada can still move to control her own destiny. In 20 years, it may be too late.

Macdonald denied rumours that he advocated Canada buy Gulf.

Canada's man in Chile welcomed coup secret cables show

Confidential cables from Andrew Ross, Canada's ambassador to Chile, to Ottawa were leaked to the press by John Harney (NDP, Scarborough West) earlier this month. This brought a strong rebuke from Mitchell Sharp, external affairs minister.

Sharp charged the leak endangered the life and effectiveness of Ross, and as a result extra guards have had to be placed at the Canadian embassy in Santiago, located in the 10th floor of a downtown office building.

Harney, however, has rejected those charges and has called for the Canadian government to help refugees in Chile who want to come to Canada.

The full text of those cables as received by the Varsity are printed below. Only punctuation has been added to clarify reading.

"Crisis Continues"

"Following brief lull, both level and seriousness of violence escalated considerably this week and recourse to firearms became more frequent both in capital and provincial centres.

"What were little sort of small battles were fought between Carabineros and extreme leftists in Rancagua, Concepcion and Valparaiso.

"Latter lasted over two hours and only ended when marines called in.

"Another incident near San Antonio involving trucks roadblock resulted in death of one and serious wounds to three others all shot in back by Carabinero machine gun fire.

"Last evening huge demonstration by tens of thousands opposition women calling for Allende resignation was broken up by riot squads using tear gas and water cannon.

"Some teargas cannisters apparently fired indiscriminately smashed windows of floors below chancery filling offices with tear gas and forcing Adam and Moeser who were working late to abandon building.

"There was also sporadic small arms fire but not clear who responsible — perhaps activists of both extremes.

"Some 40 in hospital.

"One of our chauffeurs trapped in basement garage for two hours. Nightly bombings of residences in Barrio Alto continue.

"Armed forces have conducted many raids on factories and other centres where arms caches are suspected but secrecy in preparations difficult because of informers with divided loyalties.

"MIR guerrilla (sic) training camp near coast in Cautin Province including small factory for bombs grenades discovered and raided in combined army airforce action.

"Twenty seven captured and, according to press, boats included bazookas Supplies had been landing at improvised docks from fishing craft.

"States of emergency have often been declared during last two years for less cause. However Allende and/or most parties composing up JCW apparently are afraid to give such wide authority to military.

"If Allende's objective is to sow disunity and discord within and among armed forces, he is succeeding.

"There is no question that more extreme sectors of his UP (Allende's Popular Unity party—ed) supporters have now adopted openly hostile attitude toward officers and are agitating men in ranks to disobey any order they interpret as being contrary to interests of UP workers or proletariat.

"Admiral Merino, commander Valparaiso naval zone, has taken legal steps to remove congressional immunity of Altamirano and Garretton (Mapku) so they may be prosecuted for involvement in conspiracy re 'cells' uncovered in cruiser and frigate.

"Cinc Monterox has been rejected by officer corps, but as part of tremendous pressure campaign to avoid legal process against Altamirano and Garretton, Allende has refused to accept Monterox resignation.

"Constitutional struggle continues but tending to be overshadowed by contest for raw power outside existing institutional system.

"Christian Democrats are moving in Congress to impeach entire cabinet, and Gremialist strikes seem on verge of merging into indefinite total nationwide stoppage.

"Temperature certainly has risen again, but what we are witnessing now seems rather like first few eruptions in porridge pot which Allende probably can still stop if he wishes to turn heat down.

"Even if he eventually intends to do so, I doubt Allende or responsible opposition yet ready to abandon constitutionality.

"However, because of activities of both extremes, turmoil and terrorism probably will continue at present level or even escalate in weeks ahead."

(Ed note: Ross was in Buenos Aires, Argentina, buying a car at the time of the September 11 coup in Chile. He filed this dispatch from Buenos Aires before returning to Santiago, Chile.)

September 13, 1973

"Chile's Military Government"

"In overthrowing Allende government, Chile's military and police have accepted exceedingly difficult and probably thankless task.

"Our regret that extra-constitutional and undemocratic means were adopted must be tempered, in my view, by following main considerations:

"A. Disintegration of normal institutional system had brought country to verge of anarchy and, given intransigence of politicians, armed forces command structure offered only apparently viable temporary alternative.

Mitchell Sharp says that the leak of secret cables has endangered the life of Canada's ambassador to Chile.

"B. Military had exhausted, at least in own view, possibilities of participating or collaborating with Allende short of being compromised and exploited for his political purposes.

"C. Unity and constitutional impartiality of military was under immediate threat through active and open campaigns by Marxists both within UP and MIR on left and ultras on right which might have set stage for full scale civil war.

"D. Population must be fed, which in turn made it imperative that trucks be put back to work and seeding and fertilizing of this year's crops proceed in some semblance of civil order.

"E. Inflexibility of Chilean constitution which prevented democratic solution of impasse.

"Press reports reaching Argentina indicate cabinet will be entirely military. I consider this hopeful sign that armed forces are determined to avoid becoming identified with any political current and course most conducive to obtaining support I am sure they will seek from workers.

"It would be mistake to consider action military took as 'rightist coup'.

"Christian Democrats, largest and most democratic minded of Chile's many parties, were on record as opposing military overthrow but had called on Allende to 'rectify or resign' and last week officially proposed simultaneous resignation of president and all members congress followed by new elections within 30 days.

"Now that coup has occurred, according to press reports here, party has instructed members to decline positions in government.

"I interpret this as indication that PDC while not willing to participate probably in practice will co-operate with junta in setting stage for future elections.

"This, too, is positive development for had they chosen to actively oppose it, position of junta would have been perilous indeed.

"Some stubborn extreme left resistance obviously continues and may persist for long time, but I assume moderates of all political persuasions will tend to swing behind interim government if for no other reason than alternative now seems civil war and utter chaos.

"Rumours here that General Prats may be trying to lead counter-coup.

"Even if true (which I doubt) and successfully carried out, result would be substitution of one unconstitutional regime for another at cost of further bloodshed.

"As soon as possible, after I can return to Santiago, I will try to assess extent of Junta's effective control.

"However, on present reading and at this distance, I can see no useful purpose in withholding recognition unduly.

"Indeed, such action might even tend to delay Chile's eventual return to democratic process.

"From my knowledge of views of senior military officers, unlike Brazilian or Peruvian models, they would intend to turn government back to civil authority with minimum delay feasible."

Ross

(ed note: in reply Ottawa sent Ross the following telegram)

September 17, 1973

"Chile Recognition"

"We are not inclined to rush into recognition of new regime.

"Prefer to wait until several countries particularly in Latin America (not necessarily in agreement with coup or its ideology) have acted. Interested in hearing from posts listed.

"We will also want to be reassured about well-being of Canadians in provincial districts.

(ed note: in reply to that telegram, Ross sent the following telegram.)

September 20, 1973

"Chile: Recognition — Ideology"

"It would be useful here if minister could take early opportunity to clarify statement in PST 80 (previous Ottawa telegram—ed) which could be misinterpreted.

"I assume it is not fact of Allende's downfall but manner in which it was accomplished that we regret.

"As it stands statement may well confuse majority public opinion here and even dismay and offend supporters of Christian Democrat and National Parties.

"Very generally in Canadian terms, currents of opinion represented are somewhat to left of NDP in case of former and of our Liberals and Conservatives in respect to latter. National Party has small ultra conservative wing.

"These are largest individual parties in Chile and consistently have come closest in their behaviour to representing democratic tradition as we understand it.

"In this respect I recommend re-reading of censure motion passed by congress August 22. Unless they fall to squabbling among themselves these two parties and smaller 'democratic' allies should comfortably win both presidency and control of congress in next elections.

"Your allusion to 'ideology' in GWL305 (a previous telegram from Ottawa — ed) raises interesting question whether military regime has any other than to be anti the kind of Marx-Leninism manifest by Allende government, surely one of most incompetent in recent times.

"We should not be misled by clamour from Communist and Socialist circles outside Chile — some of latter obviously misinformed — that coup was 'rightist', which is perhaps narrowly true only in peculiar Chilean context where Communist Party was most conservative element in UP.

"In my view those both here and abroad who think that what is happening represents 'restoration' are in for rude shock.

"Admiral Huerta, new foreign minister, was one of first — with Prats — to enter Allende cabinet to solve national strikes last November. He will speak at UN in few days.

"Senior military are as aware as anyone that there is broad consensus among Chileans in favour of radical social change and only with greatest reluctance did they decide that institutional disintegration and political madness of recent months had to be arrested by shock treatment.

"We have checked as best we can by phone and know of no instance of injury or mistreatment of Canadians in provinces.

"Because all foreigners are subject to suspicion and investigation, it is possible few will be picked up for questioning — as has happened in Santiago — and as necessary or appropriate we will intercede on their behalf.

"So far such action has not been inhibited by lack of recognition."

Ross

.....

September 20, 1973

(ed note: only partial text of this cable from Ross to Ottawa is available)

"There are no accurate figures and probably never will be on numbers killed as result of coup September 11.

"Deaths fall into three categories: "A. Those killed in original military operation lasting few days,

"B. Violators of subsequent edict against carrying arms or curfew,

"C. Political murders.

"First two categories abhorrent but understandable, however . . . there are innumerable stories of atrocities and it is impossible to separate truth from rumour and tales spread deliberately to create terror among active supporters of former regime.

"Result of course is panic atmosphere causing increasing numbers to seek asylum or refuge in embassies.

"Although great majority of military officers are moderates or apolitical, there has always been relatively small gung-ho faction of ultra-rightists—e.g. silly coup attempt June 29—in league with neo-fascist Patria y Libertad; and they are probably responsible for killing some leaders of socialist party MAPU and MIR according to plan during first phase of coup, possibly killing whether or not victims armed or offered resistance.

"Furthermore, xenophobia seems involved in killing of foreigners who had been working with UP particularly Cubans and Brazilians during present consolidation phase.

"I very much doubt that political murders are authorized by junta, and one hopes that now that general control has been established, regime will suppress these extremists in manner Allende was never able or willing to apply to free wheeling ultra left, which, according to former opposition parties, was responsible for over 300 killings during Allende's three years.

"One aspect of blood letting which bears further study with colleagues is apparent relative immunity of Communist Party from revenge activity.

"It was of course most moderate and responsible element in UP, but there may be more to it than that.

"Most of leadership in custody but very few even rumours of Communists having been killed."

Ross

September 24, 1973

"Chile: SitRep"

"Junta continues to consolidate physical control using some methods which are to say least indelicate and has moved in military manner to reorganize administrative apparatus although civil service still in disorder with personnel changes.

"Countless problems face new regime, most pressing being food supplies.

"Warehouse reserves being used to give temporary relief, but medium and long term prospects rather alarming.

"Tough measures and increased confidence in business circles has at least temporarily reversed black market and inflationary trends and stock market, such as it is, is booming.

"Evidence piling up of corruption in Allende government, e.g., use of public funds for UP party purposes including guerrilla training, black market operations and conversion state-owned vehicles to private ownership.

"Understandably hand is much less sure in political sphere. Junta is in 'continuous session', and no sign yet of strong man emerging although Air General Leigh appears most intelligent and forceful of rather stodgy lot.

"Wisdom is another matter. While it may be temporary remarkable parallel with Allende government in that real leadership is woefully lacking.

"In case of UP it was caused or inhibited in large measure by sectarianism within and among component parties with officials at intermediate levels going their own unco-ordinated ways and leftist extremists having almost free rein.

"Since most of military are apolitical, it appears that some at tertiary levels, who hold ultra conservative views, are operating to date without much direction or control and perpetrating such nonsense as book burning and shearing youths with long hair and beads and possibly condoning political murders.

"However, in my view major stupidity so far committed collectively at top was decision to outlaw all Marxist parties.

"Juxtaposition this decision and that of USSR to break relations not clear but Russian move could have been preemptive.

"At recent press conference General Leigh also was led into political trap of discussing, albeit in general terms, kind of future constitution he foresees with result being sharp adverse reaction from Christian Democrats, largely single party representing around 30 per cent or more of public opinion and to whose generally sensible informal counsel junta should be listening if they wish to avoid alienating all but Nationals who represent only some 20 per cent.

"However, I continue to expect that once shakedown period is over, interim regime will not have particularly conservative complexion.

"Indeed, it has already announced that workers' gains under Allende will be preserved, legally expropriated land will remain under ownership of Campesinos, firms legally nationalized will remain in state sector, and only property and companies illegally taken over will be returned to former owners.

"Chile has been on prolonged political binge or trip and military have assumed probably thankless task of sobering it up.

"As befits caretaker role, once painful withdrawal symptoms have been overcome, they will probably be delighted to arrange elections.

"In Leigh's words, Chile had become a veritable tower of Babel but will regain democratic character.

"One can only speculate as to timing of military decision that country is ready to resume democratic process, but most observers doubt elections will be held within the first year and some anticipate junta will govern until 1976 when presidential election normally would be due.

"While one is conditioned to discount efforts to justify Golpe (sic) after event, junta contention that some kind of autogolpe was being planned must be accorded some credence in view of impressive weight of evidence turning up.

"Armed services searching rigorously have discovered enormous quantities of illicit small arms, ammunition, grenades, bombs, mortars, bazookas, small rockets, and launchers, other war paraphernalia for placing explosives—almost all Soviet or Czech manufacture—guerrilla training establishments, arms factories, and documentation.

"Whether Allende was personally party to these plans or whether conspiracy was confined to Altamirano socialists MAPU and MIR remains matter for conjecture.

"However, astonishing quantities of arms were stored at palace and two presidential residences.

"It is barely conceivable that these caches could have been installed without his knowledge by his notorious personal bodyguard 'group of friends of president' (GAP), composed of Miristas most of who were released from prison in his original amnesty on assuming presidency.

"With almost entire leadership dead or in custody Chile's Marxist left is decapitated and on run.

"Country's non-political activity is returning to normal progressively and quite rapidly, but curfew still imposed 3 pm to 7 am. Reprisals and searches have created panic atmosphere affecting particularly expatriates including rift-raff of Latin American left to whom Allende gave asylum.

"Hopefully UN will be able to arrange refuge, although some of these activists' are running out of countries willing to accept them.

"Hopefully brutalities and witchhunting perpetrated by ultras—and all too reminiscent of Nazi methods—will soon be curbed by junta.

"There seems to have been considerable diminution in horror rumours during past few days, and there should be commensurate lessening of pressures on us and other embassies for refuge or asylum."

Problems of gays in straight society outlined

KINGSTON (CUP) — The female homophile, since she is both a homophile and a woman, suffers from the stereotyping attached to both, George Hislop of the Community Homophile Association of Canada told Queen's students recently.

Hislop's speech followed a film "Anything You Want To Be", dealing with the double standard imposed on women: they can be anything as long as they are housewives and mothers.

Hislop insisted that homosexuality is a fact, has always been a fact and needs no more explanation than does heterosexuality. The only difference between a homosexual and a heterosexual is the primary erotic attraction.

A homophile is no more promiscuous than a heterosexual. Just as the heterosexual is not attracted to every member of the opposite sex, neither is the homosexual attracted to every member of his sex, he said.

A large number of homosexuals are married, through pressures applied by family and friends or the need for a cover, he maintained. The legal aspects of homosexuality are a primary concern of the homophile association which Hislop leads. Although the criminal code still discriminates against those single and under 21 who engage in sexual acts, whether homo or heterosexual, Hislop claims that generally it is only the homophile who is prosecuted. He suggested that this is because heterosexual policemen cannot identify with homosexuals.

The homophile is confronted with other legal oppressions. The immigration act forbids a known homosexual to enter the country. A homophile is not allowed to adopt a child. Homosexual fathers or mothers are not allowed access to their children.

The last two restrictions, Hislop contended, were considered to be rooted in the fear that a homosexual is immoral and would raise the child as a homosexual.

Although the association has made some progress in amending certain legal discriminations, he admitted that progress is slow and it is difficult to solicit aid from political circles.

Hislop suggested that if straights discussed their fears and feelings of sexuality with gay acquaintances, 4,000 years of discrimination could be ended.

If a straight's reaction was indifferent to gays, the homophile would no longer need to fear condemnation. This, he concluded, is the objective of the association.

Varsity: a commie plot?

A former chairman of the now-defunct Edmund Burke Society, Paul Fromm, surfaced at U of T Monday in his campaign to keep Canada white and crush communism.

An underwhelming 14 students turned out to hear the self-proclaimed right-winger announce the formation of what he calls Campus Alternative.

Armed with a pile of printed material and the explanation that "people might get the impression that conservatives in Canada are illiterate," Fromm aimed his sights at The Varsity.

Taking a new twist on the traditional campus pastime, of knocking the Varg, Fromm claimed there is a "socialist" plot to monopolize the student press.

Campus Alternative, he said, should have as its first priority "the destruction of The Varsity." This should be done "by trying to find out its source of funds. Then we can attempt to cut off these funds."

At last month's SAC meeting when student budgets were passed, it was revealed The Varsity's money comes from a SAC grant and paid advertising

No energy, but profits OK

The energy crisis has most people worrying and thinking of ways to conserve power, but one of the people who is smiling through it all is W.O. Twaits, of U of T's Governing Council.

Twaits is chairman of the board of Imperial Oil Ltd., whose parent company in the United States, Exxon, reported third quarter earnings that were 80 per cent higher than those reported last year, which was $151 million in Canada.

In the wake of a world-wide energy crisis the major American oil companies have made some of the biggest profit increases in the oil industry's history.

According to US Oil Week, Gulf, Exxon and Mobil reported third quarter of July-September net incomes that were 91, 80, and 64 per cent respectively above the gains of last year. Ten other major oil companies reported an average increase in profit of 51 per cent.

In remarks prepared for the congressional record last week, representative Michael Harrington compared the oil companies to the trusts of the 19th century and warned they will continue to hold their monopoly until they are required to surrender it.

Harrington said that it is time to break up major oil companies through anti-trust actions and called for the creation of a US fuels corporation similar to the Tennessee Valley Authority, to develop domestic energy sources.

not be embarrassed about their high earnings, because the oil companies' good fortune is the nations.

The editorial asked: "How can the US pull itself out of the energy hole if not through an industry that finds itself able to generate the capital that task will require?...The reason profits have been soaring is that the industry has been operating flat out in production, refining and marketing of oil products. There is no excess capacity in the system and efficiencies are at a peak."

In order to meet the demands for oil production and exploration the annual growth rate should rise from 8 to 16 percent, the editorial added.

Rep. Les Aspin had another explanation for the oil industry's run away profits. Aspin reported to the house last week the US has been exporting fuel oil to other countries, mainly Panama and Denmark, probably 53 million gallons by the end of this year.

Nixon military coup: Congressman

ALAMEDA, CALIF (LNS-CUP) — When US president Nixon called a "military alert" during the recent fighting in the Middle East many people in the press and in government suggested that the alert was unnecessary and that Nixon called it to get people's minds off Watergate.

White House spokesmen denied the charge, but the fact that the question was raised shows how deep distrust of Nixon has become.

Perhaps the most shocking warning during that period to come from anyone connected with the government was that issued by Representative Fortney Stark as he spoke to 250 supervisory personnel at the Alameda Naval Air Station.

According to the Los Angeles Times of November 3, Stark warned that Nixon might "manufacture" an international crisis in order to launch a military coup that could keep him in office if impeachment or something similar looked likely.

"Considering the president's irrational behaviour and the existence of a military elite in this country," Stark said "it is not inconceivable that a military takeover could be attempted."

He continued, "The president could easily manufacture an 'extreme national emergency,' tell his generals to take command and send Congress and the Supreme Court packing."

But Stark added optimistically that "there are too many good officers who put the country ahead of self and politicians."

He said that he thought these "good officers" would "rebel against the commander-in-chief and keep the Republic from falling into military hands."

Varsity Blues ravage Ryerson Rams 11-1

By DAVID COOK

Varsity Blues should consider taking the name Argonauts after the fleeing they administered to the hapless Ryerson Rams, 11-1, at the Forest Hill Arena last night.

The Blues suffered momentary problems in adjusting to the smaller arena, about three minutes worth. After that it was the same old story, recorded in the shots on goal margin of 59-9.

Gord Davies notched the opener, followed closely by Ivan McFarlane with the first of his four goals.

All-star defenceman Warren Anderson put on a virtuoso display, coming from behind the net to score unassisted.

Bill Fifield, playing a fantastic game, counted his first just before Ryerson's Grant Nash replied with a freak shot that escaped goalie Jim Campbell. Doug Herridge ended Varsity scoring at five in a period which the Blues totally demolished.

Varsity had its passing down pat by the end of the period and hemmed the Rams in their own zone. The Rams refused to be shepherded about for the entire game, and came out hitting harder in the second.

The immediate result was that they started to draw penalties, but lax refereeing let several go by and Blues could only manage three goals.

MacFarlane pitched in his second and Fifield his second, while Ruhnke got his first of the game.

The Ryerson goaltender is undoubtedly getting plenty of practice and he showed it with some fine acrobatics to hold the score to reasonable levels. Among his many robberies he almost matched Jason as he stole Ruhnke and Fifield blind on breaks.

The second period ended at 8-1, with Varsity outshooting the Rams 16-2.

The game calmed down in the third period as Varsity could only manage three more, while shutting out Ryerson.

McFarlane picked up two more in his scoring spree and Ruhnke notched the other. Ryerson goalie Ken Hall again performed wonders in the nets as he was hit by a 21-2 barrage of shots. His more miraculous saves included grand larceny on Davies, Herridge, and Ruhnke.

In addition, two more Blues' goals were disallowed. The three stars for the game were McFarlane, Fifield, and rookie Chuck Luksa. Rookie Mike Lauder saw his first action as coach Watt went with six defencemen.

Harry Sems' eligibility has been cleared up, but he is still suffering from strained knee ligaments, a relic of last season's campaign. He is expected to return to action shortly.

Dodgers outthrustle Hookers

By CHRIS ROBINSON

Out of the welter of 21 qualifying teams in the touch football play-offs, the Hookers and the Dodgers emerged in the final best-of-three series.

A touchdown and convert by Onrot rocked Dodgers into the lead with Sternberg leaving the store long enough to contribute another. Silverman displayed golden fingers as he replied for the Hookers, unconverted.

In the second half the Hookers found they were Barkin up the wrong post and Dodgers won the opener 19-6.

In earlier action Jocks numbed the Nummies 27-0 before being run down by Huss' Wagons 25-13. Chuckers Chargers smoked out the Universal Joints 19-18 before choking 36-6 to Dodgers. Briefs squeezed out The Grunts 19-6 and yanked the Yankees 7-0 but came out 15-7 short to the Gridiron Grads.

Bloody Marys juiced Civil Ballers 26-6 but passed out 13-6 to Nads. Hookers smacked the Bicommute Huskers 15-12, wrote off the Rhits 20-13, nullified the Nads 13-6 and ground out the Gridiron Grads 19-6 to make the finals.

Anal Eruptions pulled off a default from Stompers but lost it 31-25 to Huss' Wagons. Skule 775 pillaged the Barbarians 7-6 and lost their purse to the artful Dodger, 21-14. Gridiron Grads titrated Chem IV 14-13. Dodgers fixed Huss' Wagons 30-6 to enter the finals.

PHE won the women's section of the interfac cross-country meet, taking three of the first four spots: 1. Carol MacDougall (PHE); 2. Geri Ashdown (PHE); 3. Joan Finlayson (Dents); 4. Lauryn Dushenko (PHE). St. Mike took the men's title, with Grads a strong threat: 1. Frank Aguanno (SMC); 2. Rick Cunningham (SMC); 3. Matt Duncan (SGS); 4. Ken Sydney (SGS).

RUGBY

By NEIL SORBYE

Monday's rugby final saw the Engineers emerge victorious with a final score of 22-0 over the Engineers. In fact, they could hardly lose, since it was Eng I over Eng II.

Martin Reader, the player-coach for the Eng I squad, opened the scoring with a strong sideline run of about 25 yards. Bob "Hoover" Cherniak converted.

Poor Eng II tackling led to three more tries. McChesney bulled his way in for the second, with Cherniak making a beautiful conversion from 27 yards out and two yards from the sideline.

Madever ran the ensuing kick-off all the way back and Cherniak again converted to make the score 18-0 for Eng I at the half.

In the second half Eng I demonstrated some classic seven-a-side rugby with quick passing and excellent backing-up. Tighter Eng II defence held them to only one more try as Smith scored between the posts. "Goofy" Cherniak missed the conversion from 15 yards directly in front.

In weekend judo action Chris Preobrazenski placed first in the brown and black belt under 205 pounds division and second in the open division in the Toronto West regional championships.

B-ball committee distills full press, Laurier lams Blues

By BOB PRITCHARD

Interfac Basketball opened its season last week seeing a few changes from last year.

Once again, there are two divisions, each with "A" and "B" parts, but the qualifying teams for the playoffs in Division I this year will be the top 3 in "A" and "B", plus the next two clubs with the best season record. In division II, the top four teams in each half will qualify. A rule change passed by the Basketball Standing Committee (by a narrow margin) made any zone press over a half court press illegal in Hart House gym. The theory behind this is that the "Black Hole" is too small for such a press, and that the referees are either incapable of or unwilling to call every single foul. Another change which may prove interesting is the addition of three female referees on the officials' roster.

UC I, who moved down to the B part of the first division this year, started off their season with a 72-42 crunching of PHE B. Klignam led UC with 16 points. In other division I action, Law I squeaked by Med A 47-45 with 14 points from Price. Field led SGS with 29 points in their 72-47 thumping of Trin A, and also counted for 28 points in their 82-72 victory over UC I. Carr had 14 points for the UC cause.

New I trounced Scar 85-55 with Wolsky sinking 20 points for the Gnus. Lichtfuss had 20 for the losers.

In Division II play, Dent A folded to For A 40-29, but then came back to nip Jr. Eng. 47-43, with Lederman hitting 17 points for the Dentists. The Foresters however, went on to lose a 44-40 decision to Mgt Stud.

St. Mike's B stifled UC II 70-25. Jr. Eng. defeated Mgt Stud. 47-40, while PHE D took New II 42-27. It was Trin B over Law II 49-39, Dent B over Pharm A 64-45, and Innis over Med B 76-48.

In other action, PHE C took Vic II 48-26 and Watt I topped Sr. Eng. 71-67. Dave Watt, of Varsity Blues fame, led the Victors in scoring.

Speaking of the Varsity Blues, on the intercollegiate basketball scene, the Blues Toronto dropped their second game in a row 100-77 to the Laurier Golden Hawks in Waterloo on Monday night. All-Star Rod Dean led the Hawks attack, aided by a 6'8" Waterloo centre. Once again the Blues were forced to revert to a man-to-man defence after Laurier managed to break the Toronto zone. Varsity plays tonight in Guelph against the Gryphons in an exhibition match.

Toronto women spike volleyball tournament

By PAT DARTFORD

This past weekend was the first taste of competition for the senior women's volleyball team and they proved to many that the new Blues will be seriously looking for the OWIAA championship come February. Toronto hosted the first challenge cup this past Friday and Saturday, but showed poor hospitality by winning it.

Toronto began the Tournament on Friday against Guelph. They handled the Gryphons with ease, taking both games 15-8 and 15-7, to await the next stronger test provided by Waterloo.

Despite dropping a close first game 15-12 the Blues pulled together as a team and came away with a 15-3 victory in the second game. The first loss would not be forgotten as the Waterloo team would be destined to face the Blues later in the final match.

Throughout the early play, it was evident that Toronto had six players on the court that complemented each other in skills, team communication, and hustle. Gayle Lyons (Toronto's Captain) came through with key spikes, consistent serves, and overall superb leadership, while Shaughn Renehan another new Blue was a versatile spark-plug on every play with her excellent ball control and unique jump sets that confused the opposing blockers.

After the Waterloo encounter, Windsor was Toronto's next victim as the Blues' power team quickly took both games 15-4 and 15-9. Irene Hammerich, a graduate from the winning intermediate ranks, came on to show her desire and her capable ability to give the key spike and add another point to Toronto's scoreboard. Another newcome, Irene Berecky, made her presence felt with a dynamic serve that frequently tested the opposing defense.

Toronto continued to play their "cool" game to defeat McMaster 15-0 and 15-11, closing out the first day of competition.

In the past, the purple gang from Western has managed to psych out Toronto during warm-up and in competition, but this year they will have to search for new magical powers to stop the Toronto machine. Toronto demonstrated their strength and poise by defeating Western 15-2 in the first game. The second game was a see-saw scoring contest but the Western squad came back to win 15-12.

This paved the way for the semi-final showdown and a rematch between the traditional volleyball rivals. Marion Thomson, our lone returning setter, again proved to be a terrific pressure player with vital serves and a consistent spirited effort whenever called upon, while Frances Walmsley made her usual solid contribution, taking Thomson's sets, putting them into the few Western defensive gaps and digging any returning spikes out of the far corners.

The afternoon encounter with Wilfred Laurier was an easy victory for the Blues as they demolished Laurier 15-3 and 15-0. Valerie Long missed most of Friday's action but responded to the call on Saturday with her keen volleyball sense and skills to assist the Blues' triumphant cause.

Due to the earlier losses to Waterloo and Western, the U of T squad finished in third spot. The first place team (in this case, Waterloo) played the fourth place finisher (pesty Ottawa) while the second and third place teams (Western and Toronto) entered the other semi-final. All play-offs were best two out of three games.

The Waterloo-Ottawa contest was a tame affair with Waterloo taking the first two games but it was the Toronto-Western showdown which provided the excitement. Toronto came out with the same desire displayed in their earlier meeting and they proved to be too much for Western to handle.

Toronto emerged with 15-7 and 15-11 triumphs to send the purple gang to the showers. Judie Trevelyan used her deceptive lefty spike to penetrate the frantic Western defenders, while Mary "Mom" Drakich, our volleyball veteran continued to tower above the net to block any Western spiking efforts.

Unfortunately, Lyons injured her knee early in the second game, but the team's togetherness took over as they responded with even more power. Peggy Duff came off the bench "cold" to replace injured Gayle, and turned in an amazing pressure performance. Heli Kaur utilized her quick ball reaction and smooth setting talents to initiate some vital Toronto attacks.

The Waterloo final was anti-climatic after the Western battle but Toronto didn't stall at this point and made up for the early loss to the black and gold by making it a relatively short final taking Waterloo 15-8 and 15-4.

The next scheduled competition is at Laurentian in early December.

Students pack Gov Council meeting; vote delayed on Discipline Code

By BOB BETTSON

After an hour of heated attacks on the new discipline code in front of a packed house at Simcoe Hall, Governing Council decided to delay voting on the structures to implement the code, probably until January.

Council chairman Malim Harding gave his "personal assurance" that implementation of the code would not be carried out in December when students are writing exams or off campus, after being pressed by a number of council members.

The code will now be referred back to the two committees which drafted it, Academic Affairs and Internal Affairs committees.

Internal Affairs chairwoman Marlene Paikin told the council that the committees would "carefully consider any constructive suggestions for amendments from all members of the university community."

But the students were not satisfied with the council's decision and met outside in the Simcoe Hall foyer after the council moved in camera for the budget. They planned further efforts in their battle for rejection of the code.

SAC president Bob Anderson urged the ad-hoc gathering to unite behind opposition to the Conway-Cadario code and put aside their differences.

The brief meeting heard a succession of speakers vow to help "broaden the campaign" and continue organizing student opposition to the code on into January when the council is expected to deal with it again.

One student referred to the fact that there has never been a violent student demonstration on the U of T campus. For many students, the most contentious clause in the code is one that makes it an offence "to unduly obstruct" any university activity.

The group agreed to enlarge the present steering committee for rejection of the code. They are to meet Monday at 4 pm at the SAC office to decide on further action. A mass petition campaign for rejection of the code was agreed on.

This meeting comes at a time when opposition to the proposed code has been mounting and Trinity, Engineering, and Erindale added their voice to the long list of groups opposing the code.

Even the Ward 6 Council, the organization which represents residents and ratepayers in downtown Ward 6, sent a statement to Governing Council deploring the treatment of students as "irresponsible transients" and calling on council to "reject the discipline code on the basis of the irresponsibility it will develop in your student population."

During the council meeting, Paikin tried to defend the code and its structures before the sceptical audience, reviewing the long history of discussion of the discipline question since the Campbell report on discipline was issued in 1969.

Paikin charged there was a "lack of understanding" among the university community about the implications of the code.

She said the committees would encourage "responsible proposals" and that there would be a "considerable period of time between approval of the structures and implementation of the code."

However the students, many of whom had pushed their way into the council chamber when officials tried to bar non-ticket holders, were not impressed. Attempts to defend the code were met with jeers while student speakers got resounding applause for denouncing the code.

Paikin claimed that the code was put together to set up a "fair system which would dispense justice swiftly and facilitate the settlement of conflict."

She said that there had been "adequate opportunities" for individuals and organizations to meet with the task forces.

Anderson told the meeting SAC

Discipline was debated at yesterday's Governing Council meeting at Simcoe Hall.

supports rejection of the code because Governing Council cannot proceed on the implementation of the code without consideration of "the whole decision-making process of the university."

He said the discipline code does not support the two most important principles of the Campbell report which assumed "that the Commission on University Government (CUG) demonstrations are legitimate."

Since the CUG recommendation of staff-student parity on all university decision making bodies has not been implemented a code should not be passed, he concluded.

Student Governor Howie Levitt attacked the code as an attempt to "stifle dissent" and give "arbitrary power" to the administration.

However Erindale professor Gary Thaler said he was "puzzled" about the student position of rejection of the code. He said amendments to "alter" the code were "a logical starting point."

Academic Affairs chairman John Dove strongly attacked the student position charging that "representation of students on bodies such as staffing committees is not relevant to discipline."

"The discipline code is to protect the functions of the university. To protect individual members from the abuse of others," he said. "I object to allowing more time to consider structures and procedures."

However student governor Norma Grindal charged that the code had been passed "when the campus was empty" last June and many students had made efforts to change it but "no one would listen."

U of T President John Evans only entered the discussion at the conclusion of the hour-long debate. He said he was "disappointed" at the lack of specific suggestions for changes in the code. He added that "careful attention should be given to the structures."

"Constructive suggestions will be considered by the Internal and Academic Affairs committees. But we can't redraft without specific representations," he concluded.

A short rally before the meeting at Sid Smith heard brief statements of support from SAC and GSU and the reading of a long list of groups that have supported rejection of the code.

The group then marched over to Simcoe Hall where they were finally admitted to the Council Chamber despite a lack of tickets. The Governing Council voted almost unanimously to change the agenda to put discipline first despite an ad it placed in The Varsity which said it would be last.

Salaries increased; divisions suffer

Most faculties, divisions, and departments will have their budgets cut for 1974-1975 to help the university pay increased salary costs for both academic and non-academic staff.

The confidential budget committee's report which was discussed at an in camera Governing Council meeting last night indicates that a real deficit is likely at the end of the 1974-1975 fiscal year, but that part of the deficit will be covered through the utilization of the accumulated surplus of $1,771,000 projected for 1973-1974. But according to the report, "The projected cumulative total university deficit of $1,021,000 will be reduced as in previous years by 1974-75 underspending."

Staff pay high priority

Most divisional budgets were reduced to pay for increased staff salaries. In fact "if all the committee's recommendations are implemented, the projected increase in expenditure will be $9,639,000. To this must be added the base deficit of $1,963,000 budgeted in 1973-74 for all three campuses." Additional expense will exceed additional income by $829,000 in 1974-75. To this must be added the base deficit of $1,963,000 budgeted in 1973-74 for all three campuses.

The result is a total projected deficit for the university of $2,792,000 for the year, comprised of $1-

387,000 on the St. George Campus, $505,000 at Scarborough College and $900,000 at Erindale College." But, "it is clear that some underspending in a budget of this size is inevitable," therefore, "we recommend the adoption of a 'Contingent Spending Plan' to allocate net under spending which is expected to occur in the 1973-74 budget."

Insufficient BTU increase

The report also indicated where it felt the blame lay: with the provincial government. It states, "...if current government policy continues, the university must expect further deterioration in its financial situation in the years ahead."

Warning that "the implications for the health and viability of the university of mounting deficits are extremely serious", the report attempts to mobilize opinion within and outside the university by saying that policies will have "inevitable effects on staffing and the quality of programs."

However, elsewhere in its report the committee has indicated areas where internal university cuts might be made to produce greater efficiency.

The budget committee feels that the government's minimum fee per cent increase in the value of the basic income unit for 1974-1975 is inadequate. (The basic income unit is used to calculate the estimated basic operating income of the university, which is calculated by multiplying the number of basic income units by the value assigned to the basic unit. This sum is the money received from the provincial government for operation of the university.)

The committee report says "the increase represents, in effect, a substantial reduction in real operating income available to the university. Faced with a major increase in the cost of most services, it is impossible for the university to maintain the same level of service as in 1973-74. The effect of current government policy is to increase greatly the pressure in the university's already limited resources."

The recommendations have to go to divisions and other departments and the budget committee's report noted that "It is expected the final budget will be submitted for information to the same committees of the Governing Council and to the council itself... After consideration and amendment and approval of the recommendations by the Governing Council, the work of building the detailed divisional budgets within approved guidelines will be undertaken by division heads and the administrative officers."

Vic delays decision on student representation

By MARILYN EMERSON

A decision regarding representation of students on the Victoria University board of regents has been postponed to January.

The Vic board of regents is the top governing structure at Victoria University. They decide on the budget, approve all academic appointments, are responsible for the operation of residences and the hiring and firing of administrators.

In the past, five to six students have participated on the board as "assessor" members only, with no voting power.

The Victoria University Act potentially allows for 39 elected student representatives on the board of regents.

Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) could try for student representation under this condition by fielding student candidates for positions on the board.

But VUSAC members feel this is not necessary. Instead they have proposed that the board of regents set a precedent by allowing eight voting student representatives to sit on the board.

In a brief presented to the board in October, VUSAC told the board that embodied in the Victoria University Act is legal provision for maximum of eight students.

An eight-student member representation would give students equal representation with the five groupings on the 43-member board: the United Church, Vic alumni, Vic faculty, Vic administrators, and Vic students.

In response to the VUSAC proposal, the board of regents offered one student position on their board.

VUSAC rejected this offer. "We believe that the offer of one seat on the board of regents of Victoria University is merely a token of the principle of student representation," VUSAC said in its brief.

Queen's will change evaluations

KINGSTON (CUP)—Queens' three year old course evaluation program will be radically altered and made confidential, if the university faculty committee studying it gets its way.

In a report to be presented before the Arts and Science faculty board, which is composed of both students and faculty, the committee will propose the replacement of the published student course evaluations by course appraisals within the faculty departments.

At present the course guide is centrally administered by students.

The committee stressed course evaluation is more important as a means of appraising and improving academic resources than as information to be used by students in choosing among various courses.

The committee claimed the public rating of courses tends to mislead students in their choices. In addition, they feared it tends to embitter potentially good instructors.

For these reasons they felt information obtained in student evaluations should be maintained strictly inside the department.

No time for Gov Council decision on Food Sciences

By BOB BETTSON

The Governing Council once again failed to reach a decision on an administration proposal to phase out the Faculty of Food Sciences. Time ran out at yesterday's marathon meeting before a vote could be held.

However, there was time for Food Sciences dean Ira Armstrong to present council with a legal opinion from Toronto law firm Thomson and Rogers stating the proposed phasing out of the faculty would violate the Lillian Massey will which left $100,000 to the university in 1906 on the condition that the faculty of household science be continued. That money would be worth far more today.

The legal opinion, written by lawyer Robert Reid, who advised the 1969 Commission University Government, declares the resolutions from the council's Planning and Resources committee clearly constitute discontinuance of the faculty.

This is because under the proposal Food Sciences would be merged with the department of nutrition of the School of Hygiene to form a new department of Nutrition and Food Science. This would involve, Reid says, the removal of three major courses now offered with 90 per cent of student enrollment.

This legal opinion differs from the one given by U of T solicitors Cassels-Brock, who have concluded the plan would not violate the will.

A confidential copy of the 1974-75 U of T budget reveals that the faculty can continue in operation for at least another year, since its budget has already been approved.

However the fate of the phasing out plan is still up in the air and chairman Malim Harding said there could be another special meeting of the council before the next meeting on December 20. He added that no decision had been made on that question.

Council members were also presented with a new response drawn up by the faculty's students and staff calling for rejection of the plan for at least a five-year period in which the faculty would continue with a new dean.

The brief also calls for a parity staff-student committee within the faculty to determine its new direction, while retaining its identity as a faculty and its "self-determination."

Before Armstrong's presentation the council heard a long resume of the deliberations of the Planning and Resources Committee, which formulated the plan, from Crown Trust Director Jim Lewis.

Lewis gave a dry speech which stressed the phase-out of the faculty was necessary for "the consolidation or resources" and the continued maintenance of the "academic excellence" of the university. He said it was in agreement with the long term objectives of the university and "the advantages outweigh the disadvantages."

He added Food Science had developed "an isolation from the rest of the university." He concluded by defending the process of consultation, maintaining there had been opportunities for dialogue with interested groups.

Dean Armstrong disagreed charging while faculty representatives were present at some meetings, they "did not feel included."

She said the council could avoid a lengthy process of litigation by bringing the department of hygiene into a larger faculty of Food Sciences.

Food Science Student Society president Irene Miller charged "there has been a sorry neglect of students opinions" on the plans to phase out the faculty.

She presented council chairman Malim Harding with a petition signed by 180 food science students demanding retention of the faculty. She told the council her major objection, was no model had been presented for the consolidation.

"There has been a lot of change in the faculty in the last three years. We are one of the only money making faculties in the university and our enrollment has tripled," she added.

The Simcoe Hall audience, filled by food science students and alumni also heard council member Patti Fleury come to the faculty's defense charging the problem of duplication or resources is not peculiar to food sciences.

She was joined by Professor Murray Hunt who said the faculty had been "starved" and maintained the issue of the will is not a "red herring" as some council members alleged.

The debate finally ended as the council adjourned after the three-and-a-half-hour meeting without a decision.

Salaries: U of T commits itself

The university will continue to regard "salaries as a first commitment against available budget resources and estimated increases in income" in the 1974-75 academic year if the administration follows a confidential budget committee recommendation.

The committee then went on to recommend:

- that the salaries of continuing full-time members of the academic staff be increased across-the-board by seven per cent in the 1974-75 fiscal year,

- that the salary levels of all part-time, junior and other academic staff also be increased across the board by seven per cent in 1974-75.

- a career advancement scheme for academic staff for a trial period of three years. In 1974-75 this requires the allocation of career advancement funds additional to the across-the-board increase to be distributed to individual members of the regular full-time academic staff solely on the basis of merit.

The fund is computed as follows:

- $725 for each continuing member of the staff whose 1973-74 salary is less than $26,900, and
- $415 for each member whose salary is more than $26,900 but less than $30,000.

In making these recommendations the committee emphasized that "no new principles are involved in this recommendation which simply implements agreed changes in a scheme adopted for the period 1973-76".

- that 1974-75 academic salary floors be raised by seven per cent to $10,200 for lecturers, $12,300 for assistant professors, $15,300 for associate professors, and $20,300 for professors,

- for continuing regular full-time members of the academic staff whose salaries are subject to special review by the Senior Salary Committee of the Governing Council, those salaries in excess of $30,000 we recommend that a salary increase fund of $2,500 per member be allocated for 1974-75 to be approved by the Senior Salary Committee on the basis of its review of individual cases.

The committee's report estimated the overall average salary increase to be about 9.8 per cent. For individual members of the academic staff, average total increases (including the career advancement component) will vary from about 14 per cent at the low end of the salary structure to about 8.3 per cent at the $30,000 level.

Non-unionized, non-academic staff

- an allocation for the 10-month cost of salary increases to non-unionized, non-academic staff of $2,077,000 for the St. George Campus, $110,000 for Scarborough College, and $102,000 for Erindale College.

The committee feels it is "not possible to separate increases for non-academic staff into merit and across-the-board components in any clear way. The funds recommended are intended to cover changes in salary scales to follow changes in salaries outside the university, advances through the salary structure in each salary grade and some remaining special provision for adjustment of anomalies in individual cases."

The committee estimates that the average annual increases will be 10 per cent.

- for professional librarians, an across-the-board increase of seven per cent, the salary floors increased accordingly, and an average merit increase of three per cent.

- the establishment of a fund of $150,000 in Don Forster's office to be allocated, in consultation with the dean of the School of Graduate Studies, to divisions on all campuses to assist in equalizing pay scales for Graduate Teaching Assistants. The scales should range from $7 to $10 an hour with individuals being placed within the scale according to their experience and teaching competence.

The committee states: "the divisions should make every effort to implement this recommendation within existing divisional budget resources without reducing the number of teaching assistantships actually available in the 1973-74 academic session."

Conway tries to defend code

By MARILYN EMERSON

Prior to yesterday's Governing Council meeting, a poised and proper Jill Conway, Internal Affairs vice-president, attempted to assure agitated students the discipline code she co-authored is not "legislation carved in stone."

"It is open for amendment," she intoned.

Whether the code would be rejected or accepted never really got off the floor. It was rhetorically squashed in front of the noon-hour crowd of students at Sid Smith.

"What if a majority of students object to the code?" a worried student asked.

Professor John Swan of the faculty of law answered that discipline code "can only operate if there is wide spread support."

"If not," he said, "it runs into difficulty." We can't say now what the long-term effects of the code will be.

Clarifying the answer Conway added, it would "not be wise to wait for total consensus to emerge."

She said "we could wait forever for total agreement" and in an illustration of this size there are just "too many disagreements."

Conway insisted students not consider the code as "rushed or hurried." She said it was in fact "a long drawn out process" which explains what Conway termed its unavoidable publication in June.

"On the basis of a referendum," a student asked, "would you be prepared to withdraw the code?"

"I can't undertake to answer that," Conway replied. She advised the student to take the question to the Internal Affairs Committee and Governing Council.

On either side of Conway and
